Mr. NELSON presented the petition of John Spallin and sundry other citizens of Glenwood, Minn., and the petition of Mrs. Phebe B. Elsey and 98 other citizens of Glenwood, Minn., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of A. T. Hoffman and sundry other citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorials of Robert Anderson and 61 other citizens of Bath, Minn.; of S. C. McClellan and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; of Mrs. P. D. Getty and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; of Lysander Cook and sundry other citizens of Good Thunder, Minn.; of W. L. Nesbett and sundry other citizens of Minnesota, and of H. J. McReady and sundry other citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Business Men's Association of Duluth, Minn., and resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Board of Trade, the Business Men's Union, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Jobbers' Union, of the city of Duluth, Minn., relative to the reorganization of the affairs of the Union Pacific Railroad Company; which were referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

He also presented a petition of the Minnesota Commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, praying for the establishment of a military park to commemorate the campaign, siege, and defense of Vicksburg; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRICE presented the petition of Allen Cowan and sundry other citizens of Morgan County, the petition of A. J. McCall and sundry other citizens of Morganville, and a petition of sundry citizens of East Liverpool, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the faculty and students of Mount Union College, Alliance, Ohio, praying for the establishment of a permanent court of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fultonham, Ohio, ex-officers and ex-soldiers of the war for the Union, for the enactment of a service-pension law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MARTIN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Charlottesville, Va., praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a large number of petitions from citizens of Randolph, St. Clair, and Washington counties, all in the State of Illinois, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to recognize Almighty God as the source of all power and authority in civil government. These petitions are all of the same nature, and I move that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALTHALL presented the petition of J. W. Moffatt and 27 other citizens of Marshall County, Miss., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of sundry citizens of Florida, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROWN. I present resolutions adopted by the Utah Society, Sons of the American Revolution, approving the efforts of the United States Government to secure the rights of belligerents to the revolutionary party in Cuba. I move that the resolutions lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions passed by the Utah Society, Sons of the American Revolution.

Whereas we, as descendants of the men and women who submitted to every hardship and sacrifice in order to secure for themselves and their children civil independence and self-government, have noted with pleasure that many patriotic societies have extended sympathy to the patriotic party in Cuba, whom we believe to be now engaged in a desperate but honorable struggle to wrest from the Spanish Government those same rights which our ancestors deemed so precious; and

Whereas we believe that the Government of the United States, born out of the necessities of a similar struggle, and now become the greatest and most powerful exponent of government by the people, owes to the cause of civil liberty everywhere its ready sympathy and the utmost recognition and aid which is consistent with the demands of justice as between nation and nation: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we do hereby express our earnest sympathy with the patriots of Cuba, and extend to them our sincere best wishes; and

Resolved, That we will give to the cause of Cuban independence all the aid and comfort consistent with our duty as law-abiding citizens of the United States; and

Resolved, That we heartily approve the efforts of the United States Government to secure the rights of belligerents to the revolutionary party in Cuba; and that we earnestly hope that our authorities at Washington may find it possible to extend to them other and more effective assistance, to the end that civil liberty and self-government may be speedily established in Cuba.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the secretary of each State society of the Sons of the American Revolution and to the Senators and Representative of the State of Utah, at Washington.

Adopted February 22, 1896.

NAT M. BRIGHAM, President.
EDWARD H. SCOTT, Secretary.

Mr. PLATT presented the petition of R. L. Warnock and 132 other citizens of Thompsonville, Conn., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States recognizing Almighty God as the source of all civil authority, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition of the Congregational Club of Crete, Nebr., praying for the recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Northeastern Nebraska Press Association at its semiannual meeting held at Randolph, Nebr., and a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the city council of Omaha, Nebr., March 3, 1896, praying for the enactment of legislation giving national recognition to the proposed transmississippi and international exposition to be held at Omaha, Nebr., in 1898; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Rev. L. Proudfit, pastor, and 51 other members of the United Presbyterian Church of Dunbar; a petition of 65 citizens of Mount Clare; a petition of sundry citizens of Adams, and a petition of 97 citizens of Nelson, all in the State of Nebraska, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1889) granting an honorable discharge to F. L. Taylor from December 2, 1864, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 559) for the relief of Bvt. Col. Thomas P. O'Reilly, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2262) to provide for the further distribution of reports of the Supreme Court and of the circuit courts of appeals, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1944) to provide for the further distribution of reports of the Supreme Court, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2034) to provide for the distribution of the official edition of the United States circuit courts of appeals reports, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 319) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war of the rebellion, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1816) granting a pension to Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 589) for the relief of C. B. Bryan & Co., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DUBOIS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1938) allowing Isaiah Mitchell, of Denver, Colo., ten years within which to make a final homestead entry upon certain land, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 26th ultimo, intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, the amendment proposing an appropriation for the support and civilization of the Ponca Indians, etc., reported it with amendments, submitted a report thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with the accompanying report; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 27th ultimo, concerning the Indian school at Genoa, Nebr., intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, reported it with an amendment, submitted a report thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with the accompanying report; which was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1317) to grant certain lands to the city of Colorado Springs, Colo., reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1994) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLATT. From the same committee I report favorably an amendment submitted by myself on the 27th ultimo, in relation to payments to freedmen, Shawnee citizens and Delaware citizens of the Cherokee Nation, intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, with various documents attending it, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The documents need not be printed; the amendment is already printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

Mr. McBRIDE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1468) extending the time allowed the Blue Mountain Irrigation and Improvement Company for the construction of its reservoirs and canal in and through the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (for Mr. GALLINGER), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2408) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890;

A bill (S. 2407) to supplement the act of June 27, 1890, as to pensions;

A bill (S. 2406) concerning the weight of evidence in pension claims; and

A bill (S. 2405) empowering fourth-class postmasters to administer oaths to pensioners.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (for Mr. GALLINGER), from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1052) increasing the pension of Luvicey J. Summers, widow of William H. Summers, late captain of Company E, Fortieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and also a soldier in the Mexican war, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. GALLINGER), from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1880) to increase the pension of Thomas J. Haughey, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1609) for the erection of a statue of Commodore John D. Sloat in the city of Monterey, Cal., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1312) to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Smallwood and the soldiers of the Maryland Line in the war for American independence, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 75) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, reported it with an amendment.

TOWBOAT ASSOCIATION OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. CAFFERY. On Thursday last the Senate passed the bill (S. 862) for the relief of the receivers of the Towboat Association of New Orleans, La. The bill is still in the possession of the Senate and I wish to correct a clerical error. The error consists in referring the claim to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the Bowman Act instead of under the provisions of the Tucker Act. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. CAFFERY. In line 6 of the bill I move to strike out "three" after "eighty," and insert "seven"; so as to read: "the act of March 3, 1887."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAFFERY. In the same line, after the word "to," I move to strike out "afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," and to insert "provide for bringing suits against the United States."

Mr. HOAR. What is the proposition? To bring suits against the Government of the United States? It ought not to go through without the Senate understanding it. I think I am justified in saying that there is no member of this body who knows what that means except the Senator who has offered the amendment.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Committee on Claims authorized me to report this bill to the Senate favorably, referring the claim of the Towboat Association of New Orleans to the Court of Claims under the Tucker Act. By a clerical error the bill was reported favorably, referring it to the Court of Claims under the Bowman Act. The amendment is to change the reference under the Bowman Act to a reference under the Tucker Act. The bill passed the Senate with this clerical error, and I simply move to correct the error in the body of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the receivers of the Towboat Association of New Orleans, La., providing for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States."

OFFENSES ON THE HIGH SEAS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1871) to provide for the punishment of offenses on the high seas, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. FRYE. That is an important bill, and it ought to be acted upon promptly. It has been reported twice in the Senate and in the other House unanimously by the Judiciary Committees; it has passed both Houses; it went to the President, and it was recalled on account of a clerical error, but recalled too late to be enacted into law in the last Congress. I ask unanimous consent that it be now acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I make no objection to the present consideration of this bill, but I desire to state that hereafter until further notice I shall object to the present consideration of any bill reported from a committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLS. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine what is the meaning of the words used in the bill as to vessels "owned in whole or in part" by the United States. Does the United States own vessels in copartnership with anyone else?

Mr. FRYE. No; it does not.

Mr. MILLS. I do not understand that expression in the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I did not notice what the expression is. The Senator from Massachusetts reported the bill from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, I will read the phrase, and I think the reading will satisfy the Senator from Texas. It reads, "on board any vessel belonging in whole or in part to the United States or any citizen thereof." Of course the words "in part" would be applicable only to the last clause—to vessels belonging in part to citizens.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me it would be better to say "belonging to the United States or in whole or in part to any citizen thereof." The words there would seem to imply that the United States is owning vessels jointly with some other Government.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it is open to that construction.

Mr. FRYE. The bill has passed the scrutiny of four Committees on the Judiciary in both Houses.

Mr. MILLS. I make no objection to the bill. I simply called attention to the phraseology because I did not understand it.

Mr. HOAR. It is a bill that has passed both Houses in this shape, and I think it is better to leave it as it is.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall not object to the passage of this bill, but I wish to state for myself, whether anyone agrees with me or not, that I dissent from the enactment of laws carrying with them imprisonment and fines which deal in general terms without specifying particular acts, but which submit to the discretion of a judge, a single individual, the personal liberty of the citizen. There are various phrases in this bill which submit it entirely to the discretion of a judge as to what shall be the offense—what act is aiding, abetting, encouraging, inciting to an assault, or to violence, or to a breach of the peace, or to any of the offenses enumerated here.

It was not the policy of the law in former times to submit to the discretion of a judge the question of the criminality of a particular act, but to specify it so that every man might have notice before he violated the law that a particular act was a crime. This bill really submits the entire liberty of the citizen to the discretion of the judge. The man may be perfectly innocent and unconscious of committing any violation of the law, and yet he may be adjudged to have aided, abetted, incited, or encouraged the act. It is a dangerous practice, because the judicial power is most despotic and absolute, and most dangerous to the liberties of the citizen.

Mr. HOAR. If this bill were liable to the criticism which the Senator from Florida has made I trust no member of the Senate would vote for it. But I think the Senator in hearing the bill read misapprehended its terms.

Under the existing law the crews of vessels plying to and from ports in the United States or to ports in the United States from any other country, owned in whole or in part here, are liable for the offenses described in the bill, which are mutiny, disobedience to lawful commands, assaults, and other breaches of the peace. There is an existing statute of the United States which covers all that, but there is no provision of law punishing passengers who do the same thing or who aid or incite the crew to do the same thing. The consequence is that, especially on the eastern coast, where excursion parties, parties of sporting characters, sometimes persons of dissipated character, go on little excursions along the coast, from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick or the islands of the British provinces to Maine or Massachusetts or New York, there is no law by which any disorderly passenger can be punished. The intent of the proposed statute is to extend to the passengers the existing law which applies to a crew. It does not, as the Senator from Florida supposes, leave to the judge to determine what the offense is. It describes the offense in the ordinary common-law phrase which describes accomplices—that is, persons who aid, abet, or incite the action.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It uses the precise words that are used in the present law as to persons who are members of the crew.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; it uses the precise words used in the old law, as the Senator from Oregon suggests, applicable to persons who are members of the crew. If this were a common-law offense, everybody who aids and abets a misdemeanor is a principal. There is no question of principal and accessory in common-law offenses of this class, and persons who did what this proposed act describes would be punishable, as of course, as principals. But there is not any United States common law, and there is not any offense of this kind at common law, if there were. So this proposed statute merely says that a person who would be a principal offender in one of these misdemeanors, if it were a common-law misdemeanor, committing it on the high seas, shall be punishable as the principal now is punishable, and it does it by extending the old law to this description of persons.

I can not myself conceive of any legislation which could more carefully limit the discretion of the court and describe more carefully and perfectly and exactly a crime beforehand than this proposed statute does. The penalty, as was suggested in the committee in its consideration, is possibly a little severe, but there is no minimum penalty in the act at all. So if it is a trifling affray a man may be fined a dollar or 50 cents, in the discretion of the judge. But that is true in regard to all assaults. You can not make a legal definition which will distinguish accurately between every degree of assault and battery or breach of the peace, from the man who touches the cheek of another in hostility or by way of insult to the man who commits an assault which brings the victim to the point of death. That must be left to the discretion of the court in the matter of punishment, as in cases of all assaults the discretion exists with the judge. I think if my friend will read the bill, he will see that it is not liable to his objection, he having heard it read hastily at the desk.

Mr. CALL. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I would ask the Senator, whose opinion is very valuable on this subject, what is "inciting a person to an assault?" What is the limitation upon it? What is "encouraging a person to assault?" A multitude of circumstances or facts may be included in those phrases.

Mr. HOAR. It is the same thing which has prevailed from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Inciting or encouraging murder makes a man an accomplice before the fact. That is the legal definition under which, from time as old as the common law itself, men who are accomplices before the fact in murders have been punished capitally. It is the old common-law phrase.

Mr. CALL. Accomplices before the fact and principals are not in question here. The question is, whether the discretion of a judge—perhaps an unlearned one, perhaps an arbitrary one—may not improperly construe the phrase "conspiring or encouraging." If I remember aright, all of the commentators upon the common law, the law of England, charge and caution against the use of vague and indefinite terms in criminal acts.

I wish to say that there is in the western portion of this country, in the State of California, three men who have been confined for eighteen months upon the opinion and judgment of a single judge for alleged contempt of court for which, so far as my opinion is concerned, there was no sufficient justification.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to correct him?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. The three parties to whom the Senator alludes are imprisoned on the verdict of a jury.

Mr. CALL. I am not informed: it may be so.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator will consult the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, recently rendered, he will there find that statement of fact, which I myself now make from personal knowledge.

Mr. CALL. Very well. That, however, does not concern the point to which I was referring. I had not that impression. But however that may be, the thought I had in my mind was in relation to "conspiracy," to crimes which rest on acts undefined in the law creating the offense, but which the judge may construe and as to which he must charge a jury. These words conspiracy, encourage, incite, aid, abet, and contempts, are all of this character—uncertain and resting in the breast of the judge.

Mr. HALE. If the pending matter gives rise to further debate I must object.

Mr. FRYE. I should not have asked for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, if I had dreamed of debate. I hope the Senator will let the bill pass now.

Mr. CALL. Very well.

Mr. HALE. Otherwise I must object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Maine to object to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. HALE. With the understanding that it will not give rise to further debate, I will not object. There are other matters pressing. If, however, the bill gives rise to further debate, I must insist that it go over.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Florida has withdrawn further opposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1871) to provide for the punishment of offenses on the high seas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARIZONA SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am unanimously directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report the bill which I send to the desk. I will not ask at this time unanimous consent for its consideration, but will do so at an early day. It is a bill meeting the objections of the President of the United States and citizens of Arizona to a bill recently passed, which was vetoed by the President. I shall, on an early occasion, ask for its consideration.

The bill (S. 2419) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona was read twice by its title.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2420) to regulate the pay of noncommissioned officers in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2447) to establish the department of commerce and manufactures; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. The bill was recommended unanimously by the National Board of Trade, lately in session in Washington. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2448) for the relief of the legal representatives of Mrs. A. Shirley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2449) granting an increase of pension to William Wells; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2450) granting a pension to John C. Fitnam; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2451) granting a pension to Jacob D. Walter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2452) for the relief of certain enlisted men of the Twentieth Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 2453) granting two townships of land to State normal colleges at Florence and Troy, Ala.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 2454) restoring the Santee Sioux Indians of Nebraska and the Flandreau Sioux Indians of South Dakota, formerly known as and being a confederacy of the Medawakanton and Wapaykoota Sioux Indians, to all rights, privileges, and benefits enjoyed by them and their ancestors under the treaties of 1837 and 1851, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2455) granting to the incorporated town of Valentine, in the county of Cherry and State of Nebraska, certain lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2456) granting a pension to Oliver P. Gooding; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2457) granting a pension to E. Bierer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2458) granting a pension to Thomas B. Roark; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2459) for the relief of Lieut. William P. Hogarty, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 2460) increasing the rate of pension of certain disabled veterans of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 93) authorizing the wearing of the distinctive badge adopted by the Sons of Veterans, United States of America, upon all occasions of ceremony; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 94) to provide for the purchase of the painting by J. Walker, representing the capture of the City of Mexico, September 13, 1847; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MANTLE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim S. 2304, granting a pension to Daniel Coonan, referred to the Committee on Pensions, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn, and the said papers be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONSIDERATION OF CUBAN RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie over and be printed:

Resolved, That the consideration of the report of the conference committee on the Senate concurrent resolution 19, relating to Cuba, be postponed until Monday, April 6, and that the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed before that time to report to the Senate the facts which, in their opinion, justify the passage of said resolution, together with the evidence thereof.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. HOAR. I offer a resolution, to which I hope there will be no objection. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, so far as in his opinion may be compatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate all facts which may be in his possession relating to the existing conflict in the Island of Cuba, and especially such as affect the interests and duty of the United States in the premises.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go over.

Mr. HOAR. It is merely a resolution asking for information.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WASHINGTON GAS LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. CALL. I ask leave to present a resolution, by request, relating to the Washington Gas Light Company, which I ask may be printed and go over under the rule.

The resolution was read and ordered to be printed and lie over, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, directed to obtain from the Washington Gas Light Company and report to the Senate a statement under oath showing the amount of cash on hand on the 1st day of January, 1895, including money on deposit in banks and elsewhere; also a statement of the money received from consumers of gas; also how much money received from other sources; each to be given separately; also the disbursements of money, and for what purpose; also the amount of money at the close of business on the 31st of December, 1895, including money in bank and elsewhere.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer a resolution of instructions to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table. At a future day I shall call it up and submit some remarks upon it.

The resolution was read, and ordered to be printed and lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on Pacific Railroads, to whom Senate bill No. 1131 was heretofore referred, are instructed to report the same to the Senate, with such amendments, if any, as they choose to offer thereto to carry out in better form or to accomplish more effectually the purposes thereof. Said bill is as follows:

"A bill relating to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the court of appeals of the District of Columbia is hereby given jurisdiction over any and all suits that may be brought by the United States to enforce or obtain other relief upon any lien or liens on any railway or railways or on any property belonging to one or more railway corporations, wherever such property may be situated.

"SEC. 2. That separate liens upon different railways or railway properties may be enforced by the United States in the same suit when such railways constitute or were intended to constitute together a through line, or are part of or connected with a through line or general system of railways. The court shall have power to make such orders concerning the sale of said property as may be just and proper for the protection of the interests of all parties concerned.

"SEC. 3. That said court shall have power to issue process, mesne and final, which shall run into any district and be served as other like process by the marshal of such district, and to enter all proper orders, decrees, and mandates, including orders, decrees, and mandates for the payment to the United States of any deficiency arising upon a sale under such lien.

"SEC. 4. That holders of liens on any such railways or property may be made parties to such suit, or may intervene if not made parties, and said court may order any and all proceedings by any party or parties in other courts having jurisdiction of part only of the property involved to be discontinued or stayed until the termination of such suit by the United States."

And said committee is further instructed to report, in connection with said bill, an original bill, or amendments to the foregoing bill, which will embody substantially the following provisions:

First. A provision for refunding the outstanding bonds, held by bona fide owners who are not indebted to the United States on legal or equitable demands, that have been heretofore issued by the United States to the Union Pacific Railroad Company or any of the branch railroads of said company, or to the Central Pacific Railroad Company or any of its branch railroads. And also for refunding the first-mortgage bonds, held and owned in like manner, that are a first lien upon the railroads or the said branches thereof, and upon any other property of either of said railroad companies.

Second. That said bonds shall be refunded in the bonds of the United States to mature after thirty years, at the option of the Government, and subject, at any time after ten years, to be called in and paid by the United States; and to bear interest, payable quarterly by the United States, at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum.

Third. That the bonds so refunded shall be taken up and held in the Treasury of the United States and shall be registered as the same are so substituted by bonds issued under this act; the said bonds to be exchanged, dollar for dollar of their face value, not to include interest thereon that may have accrued.

Fourth. The bonds so taken up to remain secured by and attended with all the liens and priorities by which their payment, or the payment of the interest thereon, are now secured, and by all other liens that may be created by law to secure the same, as statutory liens and priorities in favor of the United States; to all of which liens now existing the United States shall be fully substituted as each of said bonds is exchanged for bonds issued under this act.

Fifth. A sinking fund will be provided for the payment of the principal of the bonds issued under this act, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum thereon, payable quarterly, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States and invested and reinvested in good interest-bearing securities. The sinking fund to be raised from the income of said companies, respectively, over and above the actual current expenses of operating their respective railroads, the interest on bonds issued under this act, and the sums paid quarterly or annually to salaried officers, which current expenses shall also include all necessary outlay for repairs of the railroads and their appurtenances and for the purchase or repair of rolling stock; but shall not include the payment of any unsecured debt or damages claimed against either of said railroad companies, except such as are owing to the United States.

Sixth. If the interest on the bonds issued under this act is not paid out of the income of said railroads or other sources of revenue derived from the assets of either of said railroad companies, as the same falls due, it shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Seventh. The treasurer of each of said companies shall file in the Treasury Department of the United States within the first five days of each quarter of the fiscal year after the first quarter a sworn statement of the amount of money in his custody that is applicable to the sinking fund and to the interest payable on bonds issued under this act for the preceding quarter, and shall pay the same into the Treasury of the United States, and the interest on said bonds for such preceding quarter shall be payable on the 10th day of each quarter.

Eighth. And to provide further, directing that the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with section 5 of the act approved July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," shall take possession of the whole line of the railroad and telegraph, together with the rolling stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description in possession of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and also of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, belonging to or being a part of each of the railroads, and equipments of every sort, that were built under the provisions of said act of Congress, or any amendment thereof, together with all the rights, functions, immunities, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and also all lands granted to and belonging to either of said railroad companies that have not been conveyed to bona fide purchasers, which possession, so taken by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be for the use and benefit of the United States. And, until Congress shall otherwise direct, the said property of every kind and description, whether in action or possession, shall be held and controlled as the property of the United States, to be administered, as is provided in this act, in conformity with the general uses and purposes for which said railroad companies were instituted, and under the laws regulating and controlling said companies, respectively, as the same are amended in this act, or may be hereafter amended.

Ninth. Amend the acts under which said railroad companies were chartered and organized, and all acts amendatory thereof, if necessary, so as to create for said railroad companies a board of directors to control and manage both of said companies, who shall supersede the existing boards of directors in each of said railroad companies, and shall be substituted for each of said boards of directors, in the full direction and control thereof, in the exercise of all the powers heretofore conferred upon such directors, not inconsistent with this act.

Tenth. Said board of directors shall consist of nine citizens of the United States, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. They shall be competent business men, four of whom shall reside in States lying east of the Mississippi River, and four of them in States or Territories west of that river, the President of the United States to designate and commission one of said appointees as president of said board of directors, and he may be appointed from, or reside in, any part of the United States.

Eleventh. The members of such board of trustees shall each hold his office for the period of four years, except as is hereinafter stated, and shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States, and no person shall be qualified to fill said office who is now an officer, director, employee, or stockholder in either of said railroad companies, or a member of Congress, or an officer of the Government of the United States, or who is an officer, employee, or stockholder in any other railroad company or transportation company by land or water, or in any telegraph or telephone company, or in any telegraphic cable company. In the first appointment four of said directors and the president of the board shall be appointed for two years, and their successors shall be appointed for the term of four years.

Twelfth. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a general treasurer for each of said companies, who shall be a citizen of the United States, a competent accountant and business man, one of whom shall have his office at San Francisco, Cal., and the other at Omaha, Nebr. They shall each give bonds conditioned and payable in such amount as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, such as other accounting officers of the United States are required to give, and they shall each be under the direction of the board of directors, within the powers conferred by this act upon said board, as to all money, or rights, credits, or other assets of the company for which each of them is appointed, as such general treasurer: Provided, however, That as to any money that either of said general treasurers shall be liable to account for or to pay to the United States under this act, they shall discharge their duties in that behalf under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

Thirteenth. The general direction and the control of both said railroad companies and of all the property thereof is confided to the board of directors instituted under this act, who shall manage the same as one through line of transportation, including all the branch roads belonging to either company, between the eastern and western termini of said railroads. And for this purpose said board of directors shall have power, subject to law, to fix and regulate the rates of freight and passage on any part of said lines of railroad and to appertion the income, as between said companies, according to justice, when such income is derived from freight or passengers transported from one of said railroads over any part of the line of the other. The board of directors shall adjust all claims for loss and damages and concerning current expenses and the use of rolling stock as between said companies.

Fourteenth. The branch lines that belong to each of said railroad companies, or in which either of them holds the majority of the stock thereof or has the right of control at the date of this act, are to be subject to the authority of the board of directors constituted by this act as to all rates of freight they shall prescribe, and they shall receive such pro rata allotment of the income from such sources as said board of directors shall adjudge to be just.

Fifteenth. The lands granted to each of said railroad companies and remaining unsold, and all lands acquired by either of said companies and held by them under legal title or any equitable right, either of property or possession, not needed or used for the use, convenience, or advantage thereof, shall be set apart and the proceeds thereof when sold or leased shall constitute a fund to be applied to the betterment of the said railroads, or to the building of such other lines or branches as Congress shall authorize to be constructed to connect with the main lines of the said railroads.

Sixteenth. No dividends shall be paid to the holder or owner of any stock in either of said companies until such stockholder shall register such stock in books kept for that purpose and shall sign an agreement, to be set forth in such book, that the excess of such stock above the percentage that it bears to the value of all the property belonging to such company, and to the whole sum of the stock issued by such company, is surrendered. The entire property less the unsecured indebtedness of each of said railroad companies shall be valued by the board of directors, by the 1st day of December, 1896, and shall be compared with the amount of stock issued and outstanding by said companies, respectively. And the whole amount of stock in each of said railroad companies shall be reduced to correspond with the whole value of its property, of every kind and condition, so ascertained and determined. When certificates of stock heretofore issued are surrendered, new stock shall be issued for the amount to which the holder is entitled under this act, and no other stock shall be recognized as being valid for any purpose.

Seventeenth. The offices of president, vice-president, and treasurer, as they now exist in each of said companies, are suspended as to the present incumbents and as to all their functions, and the president of the board of directors and the general treasurers, as provided in this act, shall exercise respectively such duties as appropriately belong by law, or by the by-laws of said companies, to the present presidents or vice-presidents or treasurers of said companies. And the board of directors are empowered to alter said by-laws. All other officers and employees of each of said companies appointed by authority of said corporations, respectively, are continued in office and employment until they are removed by authority derived from this act; and the president of the board of directors is empowered to remove any officer or employee in the service of either of said companies except the directors and general treasurers.

Eighteenth. All books, papers, documents, and letters belonging to the business or direction of each of said railroad companies, and all contracts or deeds relating thereto, and all money, rights, credits, notes, drafts, exchange, or other assets of either of said railroad companies, in the custody of or under control of any person holding possession thereof as a bailee of either of said companies or in any fiduciary capacity, shall be turned over to the president of the board of directors or to the general treasurer of the company to which the same belong. Any person who shall willfully refuse so to deliver such property on demand shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of like offenses shall be fined in a sum not less than $500 and shall be imprisoned for not less than thirty days for each offense. And if any such person who has in his or her keeping, as the agent or officer of either of said companies, any book, record, paper, letter, or document, filed or kept as belonging to said company, shall willfully and corruptly alter, deface, or destroy the same, he shall suffer such punishment as is provided by law for those who alter or deface or destroy books, papers, records, letters, or documents on file or belonging to any bureau of the Treasury Department of the United States.

Nineteenth. The board of directors appointed under this act shall have all the powers conferred upon the directors of either of said companies under any laws or acts of Congress that now apply to either of said railroad companies or shall hereafter apply to them, but they shall preserve the corporate rights and property of each of said companies and the income and all expenditures for account of each company distinct from the other. They shall have separate headquarters and separate books of accounting, and separate reports shall be made for each company.

Twentieth. The Government of the United States preserves the charters and all the rights and powers of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, except as the same are repealed, altered, or amended by this amendatory act; and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to affect any right of any person or corporation which is not divested lawfully by its provisions, or to affect any jurisdiction of any court as to suits or actions by either of said companies, or against either of them, except in cases where the United States are a necessary party to the suit or proceeding, or would be a proper party if the Government should choose to become a party therein. In the cases so excepted, no court shall have jurisdiction of such matters other than the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and no receiver for either of said railroad companies shall be appointed or continued in office by any court.

Twenty-first. The United States is not responsible for any debt created or any damages incurred by either the Union Pacific Railroad Company or the Central Pacific Railroad Company heretofore or hereafter not provided for by the issue of bonds under this act; and, as to such debts, the liability of the United States is regulated by the terms and provisions of this act, and is limited to the means and method of payment and security that is herein expressly provided.

Twenty-second. No stockholder in either of said railroad companies shall receive any dividend on his stock until the debts of such company the payment of which is not secured by this act shall have been paid, nor shall such stockholder receive any dividend on his stock in either of said companies until the interest is paid which falls due, as provided in this act, upon all bonds for which the United States or the company that issued such stock is liable, and until the sinking fund is fully paid for the fiscal year in which or for which such dividend is declared.

Twenty-third. The Government of the United States hereby declares that it stands seized and possessed in its own right of all the property to which this act relates, the control and administration of which is provided for in this act and in the laws which are herein amended; that it holds said property as a means and instrumentality of National Government and of interstate and international commerce; that it is necessary, in the present condition of said property, and for the execution of the original purposes of the grants of property, credits, and powers to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, these said companies should be hereafter consolidated and conducted as a through line from the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad to the Pacific Ocean, and in such manner as Congress shall hereafter provide; that it is necessary for the accomplishment of these purposes of Government and for the welfare of the people that the authority of the United States over said through line of railway should be maintained as it has heretofore existed and is enlarged and confirmed by this amendatory act; that the Government will preserve, as far as is consistent with justice and the general welfare, this property for the payment of all lawful demands of the creditors of either of the said railroad companies, and when the same is freed from debt, will admit the owners of stock in each company, upon their compliance with this act, to share according to the just value of said property and in proportion to the stock held by each shareholder, after the same has been adjusted in the manner provided in this act; and that when the said companies are consolidated equal justice shall be done, as far as may be, to all shareholders in each of them.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 4th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 103) relating to final proof in timber-culture entries; and

An act (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory."

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 6th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 141) granting a pension to Julia A. Hill; and

An act (S. 259) granting to the Columbia and Red Mountain Railway Company a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives on the Agricultural appropriation bill may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to some and disagreeing to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5061) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House and agree to the conference asked for.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. CALL were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 175) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain uses of national military parks was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 2921) to repeal section 6 of an act entitled "An act to define the duties of pension agents, to prescribe the manner of paying pensions, and for other purposes," approved July 8, 1870, and now being section 4784, Revised Statutes of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 4463) to grant two condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Thirteenth Separate Company, National Guard of State of New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 5633) to incorporate The Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of Indian Territory was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. 6936) for the reconstruction of Rock Island Bridge was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF LIEUTENANT FOULKE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 24th ultimo, a report from the Secretary of State in relation to the claim of the legal representatives of Lieut. George C. Foulke against the Government of the United States.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, March 2, 1896.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST AMERICAN PRODUCTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, in response to the Senate's resolution of February 6, 1896, addressed to the Secretary of State, copies, in translation, of the decrees or orders of the Governments of Germany, France, Belgium, and Denmark, placing restrictions upon the importation of certain American products.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 9, 1896.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the concurrent resolution in relation to Cuba.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to make an announcement?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; but I would say that the motion to proceed to the consideration of a conference report is always privileged.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is always in order, and I am not objecting to it; but I simply wanted to say to the Senate that it would be exceedingly agreeable to me if I could have the privilege to-morrow, immediately after the disposition of the routine morning business, to address the Senate upon the question of the amendment of the revenue bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Missouri will be noted.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the Cuban concurrent resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to proceed to the consideration of the conference report indicated by him, which will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate (Con. Res. 19, part 5), having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House, and agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
JOHN T. MORGAN,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT R. HITT,
JAMES B. McCREARY,
ROBERT ADAMS, JR.,
Managers on the part of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The conference report is before the Senate, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I was one of the few Senators who a week ago last Friday voted against the Cuban resolutions then submitted by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have seen no reason since to regret my action, and I will to-day, or whenever a vote shall be taken, vote against adopting the report of the committee covering the resolutions which are reported by the committee of conference. All of the reasons which at that time seemed to me pressing and conclusive against any such action as was then contemplated and as is contemplated here have grown in strength in my mind since that day.

I did not feel then that upon so important a matter, closely involving relations with a hitherto friendly power, the Senate possessed information to justify a recognition of belligerency against a friendly government and in favor of the insurgents upon the Island of Cuba. I did not believe that the inflammatory appeals that were made to this body by Senators in favor of the proposition, based upon alleged statements of atrocities and horrors on the Island of Cuba, were sufficiently backed up as facts for the Senate to act upon; and that feeling, Mr. President, has become greatly strengthened by events that have occurred and other information which has been brought to light since the day when the resolutions were passed.

I voted "nay" also because the question of the treatment that should be given to insurrection in the Island of Cuba against the Spanish Government is no new subject. President Grant once alluded to these outbreaks as "periodical," and I well remember that in the Forty-first Congress, in my early service in the other House, in the year 1870, a condition of affairs largely like the present was then brought before Congress, and a deliberate purpose made known and urged to involve this country in possible conflict with the Government of Spain by recognition of belligerency to the then Cuban insurgents.

The matter was before both Houses of Congress. In the House of Representatives it had been considered at length by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of that body, presided over by General Banks, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, and that committee stood ready to report, and did report, the conclusion which I hold in my hand in a document coming over from that Congress, going almost as far as the resolutions now before the Senate.

Fortunately for the country, fortunately for the interests of peace, there was then in the President's chair a man whose love of liberty and whose patriotism certainly were equal to those possessed by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and who knew a great deal more about belligerency and war than they do, or than any of us do—General Grant. On the 13th of June, 1870, General Grant from the Executive office sent to Congress the message which is in the book that I have before me. I shall ask the Secretary to read from it, not the whole text, for I do not want to prolong the debate, and my part in it will mainly be citing certain papers, communications, and documents bearing upon this most important question. It will be interesting to Senators who listen to the utterances of General Grant in 1870 upon the question now before this body, as to recognizing the belligerency of the insurgents in Cuba, to notice how that message sounds as though it had been written for to-day, as though all the considerations that then presented themselves to General Grant were considerations upon a condition of affairs that exist in this year 1896 instead of the year 1870; and the application of law that he makes to the circumstances is just as pertinent, is just as directly in the line of international law upon the subject, as though the message had come in to-day from the President and lay freshly written upon our desks.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Maine what was the action of the House or of the Senate or of both bodies at that time with regard to the resolutions of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. HALE. I proposed to state that as a result of the message. I will say now in answer, before having the message read, that the whole recognition proposition in the presence of the message from the President fell to nothing, came to nothing. The message was so clear and distinct in its statements of the situation and propounded such an unanswerable proposition of law that, subordinated to the utterance of the calm-browed man who sat in the Executive office, all the excitement disappeared, and the resolutions reported to the House of Representatives went for nothing. I ask the Secretary to read from the message the parts I have marked, though the whole document is worth careful consideration. I ask the attention of Senators to this message.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

During the six months which have passed since the date of that message the condition of the insurgents has not improved, and the insurrection itself, although not subdued, exhibits no signs of advance, but seems to be confined to an irregular system of hostilities carried on by small and illy armed bands of men, roaming, without concentration, through the woods and the sparsely populated regions of the island, attacking from ambush convoys and small bands of troops, burning plantations and the estates of those not sympathizing with their cause.

But if the insurrection had not gained ground, it is equally true that Spain has not suppressed it. Climate, disease, and the occasional bullet have worked destruction among the soldiers of Spain; and although the Spanish authorities have possession of every seaport and every town on the island, they have not been able to subdue the hostile feeling which has driven a considerable number of the native inhabitants of the island to armed resistance against Spain and still leads them to endure the dangers and the privations of a roaming life of guerrilla warfare.

On either side a contest has been conducted and is still carried on with a lamentable disregard of human life and of the rules and practices which modern civilization has prescribed in mitigation of the necessary horrors of war. The torch of Spaniard and of Cuban is alike busy in carrying devastation over fertile regions; murderous and revengeful decrees are issued and executed by both parties. Count Valmaseda and Colonel Boet, on the part of Spain, have each startled humanity and aroused the indignation of the civilized world by the execution, each, of a score of prisoners at a time, while General Quesada, the Cuban chief, coolly and with apparent unconsciousness of aught else than a proper act, has admitted the slaughter, by his own deliberate order, in one day, of upward of 650 prisoners of war.

Mr. HALE. Now, will the Secretary read what is within the next bracket?

The Secretary read as follows:

During the whole contest the remarkable exhibition has been made of large numbers of Cubans escaping from the island and avoiding the risks of war; congregating in this country at a safe distance from the scene of danger, and endeavoring to make war from our shores, to urge our people into the fight which they avoid, and to embroil this Government in complications and possible hostilities with Spain. It can scarce be doubted that this last result is the real object of these parties, although carefully covered under the deceptive and apparently plausible demand for a mere recognition of belligerency.

It is stated, on what I have reason to regard as good authority, that Cuban bonds have been prepared to a large amount, whose payment is made dependent upon the recognition by the United States of either Cuban belligerency or independence. The object of making their value thus contingent upon the action of this Government is a subject for serious reflection.

Mr. HALE. As I have said, if any dispassionate man were to-day to make a review of present conditions in the Island of Cuba, the flight of the Cubans to this shore, avoiding participation in danger there and seeking to foment and increase the war feeling, no language could be selected that would portray the situation better than that which has been read from the message of General Grant written in 1870.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate by having the entire message read, although there is nothing in it that is not good, sound, practical sense. The message is stamped with the good sense, the patriotism, the discernment characteristic of General Grant, and at last he lays down the proposition touching belligerency that is as clear a guide for us to-day, or ought to be, as it was then for Congress, which accepted it without question, and the subject passed for the time being from the consideration of men in or out of Congress.

I ask the Secretary to read President Grant's conclusion upon the subject of belligerency, on page 801 of the message.

Mr. GRAY. Is that a special message or an annual message?

Mr. HALE. A special message.

Mr. WHITE. What is the date of it?

Mr. HALE. June 13, 1870.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The question of belligerency is one of fact, not to be decided by sympathies for or prejudices against either party. The relations between the parent State and the insurgents must amount, in fact, to war in the sense of international law. Fighting, though fierce and protracted, does not alone constitute war; there must be military forces acting in accordance with the rules and customs of war, flags of truce, cartels, exchange of prisoners, etc., and to justify a recognition of belligerency there must be above all a de facto political organization of the insurgents sufficient in character and resources to constitute it, if left to itself, a State among nations capable of discharging the duties of a State, and of meeting the just responsibilities it may incur as such toward other powers in the discharge of its national duties.

Applying the best information which I have been enabled to gather, whether from official or unofficial sources, including the very exaggerated statements which each party gives to all that may prejudice the opposite or give credit to its own side of the question, I am unable to see, in the present condition of the contest in Cuba, those elements which are requisite to constitute war in the sense of international law.

The insurgents hold no town or city; have no established seat of government; they have no prize courts; no organization for the receiving and collecting of revenue; no seaport to which a prize may be carried, or through which access can be had by a foreign power to the limited interior territory and mountain fastnesses which they occupy. The existence of the legislature representing any popular constituency is more than doubtful.

In the uncertainty that hangs around the entire insurrection there is no palpable evidence of an election, of any delegated authority, or of any government outside the limits of the camps occupied from day to day by the roving companies of insurgent troops. There is no commerce, no trade, either internal or foreign, no manufactures.

Mr. HALE. That again is an exact picture of the condition of the insurrection in Cuba to-day. The insurgents have no government except on paper. They have no legislature. It is not pretended that they have. They have no courts to administer justice. That is not claimed. They hold no ports. Their power is seated, as General Grant described it in 1870, in the straggling bands that occupy straggling camps, and to the present day not only has the insurrection not won a battle, but it has hardly fought what deserves the name of battle. It is, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], a case of clean, outright guerrilla warfare. I ask Senators who voted for this resolution before, or what is nearly the same resolution, to contrast for a moment the condition of the insurrection in Cuba as entitling it to a recognition of belligerency, with the status of the great rebellion in the South, when European nations in most guarded fashion, and not by offensive resolutions, but simply orders which established neutrality, saw fit in that modified form to accord a kind of belligerency to the Southern Confederacy.

At that time when this was accorded to the Southern Confederacy that Confederacy was in undoubted possession and occupation of more than a million square miles of territory. With three or four exceptions, there was not within its confines or on its coasts a single post held by the Federal Government. Resolutions of secession preliminary to the establishment of the Confederacy had been passed after the test of popular elections and after the deliberate actions of State legislatures. The sentiment which had for a time prevailed for Unionism against secession had apparently been utterly destroyed and the States had set up a new government. They had met together and established a Confederacy with legislative powers in full force, with a department of the army and the navy, with regular officials recognized at the capital, with great armies in the field, and with courts of justice established throughout the whole length and breadth of the Confederacy. Not one detail that I am giving as applying to the Confederacy in the early months of 1861 can be claimed for or is claimed for the insurrection on the Island of Cuba. And yet, notwithstanding that, the European powers hesitated long, and the State Department, presided over by Secretary Seward, implor-ingly, entreatingly urged upon European powers the injustice of even so limited a recognition as was then proposed, and never ceased, after that limited recognition, to insist, as the volumes of diplomatic correspondence show, upon the rescinding of that recognition.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Spain did not hesitate.

Mr. HALE. I am glad the Senator from Oregon has said that, because it will be worth the while for him or any Senator who believes that Spain at that time was less favorable and less friendly to us than were other powers, to read the volumes of diplomatic correspondence as I have read them within the last week.

There was no European power that through the early years of that war, when these questions came up and when other nations were on the point of proceeding from recognition of belligerency to recognition of independence, showed the friendliness to us that the Kingdom of Spain showed. Spain never allowed a British built and equipped privateer to remain in her ports for one hour beyond stringent and necessary supplies, and when the British built and equipped privateers with prisoners taken from Union vessels entered the ports of Spain, those prisoners were at once released by the Spanish authorities. The diplomatic correspondence shows that after this limited recognition, far less than what is sought by the Committee on Foreign Relations now, had been accorded by certain European States, the labor, the anxiety, the tremendous strain that fell upon those who were at the head of the Government to prevent further recognition did not apply to Spain, and there was no danger from that source. The correspondence with our minister at Madrid shows this most clearly. The danger came from France and from England, and I am glad that the Senator from Oregon interrupted me by calling attention to the action of Spain. I had forgotten, before reading the correspondence—as the Senator has evidently forgotten—that the record discloses that no European power, excepting Russia, gave us less trouble during the war than Spain.

Now, Mr. President, if this be so; if there is so little basis for the action now sought to be taken by the committee; if so little reason exists, in the light of precedents, in the light of the law as laid down by General Grant, I have said to myself how is it accounted for that there is so much apparent public sentiment in favor of action on the part of the United States—some such action as the veteran Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has reported to this body? Why is it that such a portion of the newspaper press of the country is continually urging and seeking to drive Congress forward to inflammatory action? Why is it that when the question came up last Friday week so large a vote was found in this body and in the other body for the belligerency resolutions, and so meager a vote against them? I have asked myself that question, and I have concluded that more than anything else which accounts for the apparent sentiment of so many people, so many newspapers, and so many members of this body and of the other branch of Congress is the fact that the country and Congress have been impressed falsely and mendaciously with a condition of things in the Island of Cuba that does not exist.

When the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], on the day when the vote was taken here, read, from what he supposed was an authority, recitals of Spanish atrocities that would make the blood of any natural man leap hotly in protest, it did not fail to have its influence upon this body. It did not fail to have its influence in the other body. In the hurry and the clamor of the debate, almost all upon one side, Senators lost sight of the fact that here was an ingenious attempt not to show excesses and murders and outrages at present characterizing the conduct of war upon the part of Spain in Cuba, but to connect the Spanish authorities of to-day and the commanding general of the island with atrocities or alleged atrocities that took place fifteen or twenty years ago.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] read from a book, giving the name of the author——

Mr. SHERMAN. I read from a newspaper translated.

Mr. HALE. The Senator read from what he believed and we believed to be a contemporaneous account of certain almost indescribable atrocities committed by the Spanish military authorities in the old insurrection, and of barbarities on the part of the Spanish commander, and the direct allegation was made that the present commander, General Weyler, was then and there the author and finisher of those atrocities; that they were committed under his eye. Certainly I got the impression, as I believe every other Senator here did, that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations was reading to us from a document, with some pretense to authority, statements which involve as a part of that document or of that volume the presence, the order, and the directing hand of the present commanding general of Spanish affairs in Cuba in the old revolt.

Now, Mr. President, I know there is no man in the Senate who would resent such an imposition being played upon him more than would the Senator from Ohio. His long experience and the confidence the country has in him as a conservative leader ought to make him sensitive under such imposition. I know that the Senator himself supposed he was reading from good authority. It turns out that a newspaper assumed this most remarkable statement that General Weyler was the author of the atrocities in the old rebellion and responsible for them, and that for that reason he had been selected by the Spanish Government to put down the insurrection now, which in itself implied a desire on the part of the present Spanish Government to return to the outrages and atrocities which the Senator had read here.

Now, Mr. President, it turns out that the book by the author given by the Senator, who, by the way, had the wrong name, was only a pamphlet of about 40 pages, written by a fugitive from the island, opposed to the Spanish Government, and that even he did not claim that in any way General Weyler was responsible for or connected with or present when the alleged outrages were committed.

I am glad that for one, not knowing things to the contrary, but believing that there was another side, I voted "nay" against the resolution. If I had voted "yea" for the resolution last Friday week, in view of what has been disclosed since, the facts that have been brought to light, the manner in which they have been brought to light, and the impositions disclosed and open to the light, I would be most glad to change my vote and vote "nay" now. I would do it, as the lawyers say, and gladly do it, upon the newly discovered evidence.

Mr. President, I have here the very moderate, respectful, and dignified statement of the minister of Spain, brought out by the recitals which so swayed the Senate when this subject was before them, brought out most properly, brought out most naturally. I do not wonder that the representative of that Government, finding his people and his administration and his nation arraigned in the manner that they were in this body, thought it advisable and right and fitting, and even diplomatic, to present the facts in this case to the American people, so that they might consider them and Congress might take advantage of this new light. I ask the Secretary to read from what I send to the desk, the Spanish minister's statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

> I read with the deepest regret the statement made in the Senate by some of the most influential Senators of the United States, knowing that the facts which were stated by them were incorrect; that their good faith, of which I have no doubt, had been imposed upon, and that it would be very easy for me to prove with a little time that the Senators had been misinformed by persons interested in bringing a misunderstanding between the two countries.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to a communication from a foreign minister on any matter of international relations, especially one censuring the Senate and the members thereof, being read in this body.

Mr. HALE. Well, Mr. President, this seems to me a most remarkable objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Remarkable in what respect?

Mr. HALE. In the first place, there is nothing whatever in the language of this communication that in any degree censures any member of the United States Senate. The language is singularly guarded. It imputes no malice, no falsehood to any Senator, but it is accompanied by expressions of profound respect. The whole tone of the communication is deprecating and not defiant.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The question I desire to ask the Senator from Maine is if this communication is not in direct contravention of the well-understood and well-established rule that no foreign minister shall discuss in the country to which he is accredited in the public press any of the political questions then agitating that country?

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I do not understand anything of the kind.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is.

Mr. HALE. It is not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senate. Objection is made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. The rule is as follows:

> When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

That is Rule XI.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely willing that the question (and I will not say another word) shall be submitted to the fairness and good sense of the Senate whether this statement of the Spanish minister, couched in this language, shall be forbidden to be cited here in this body.

Mr. GRAY. Published in the newspapers and not addressed to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Not addressed to the Senate at all, as the Senator says, but simply published in the newspapers.

Mr. TELLER. I do not understand that the objection goes to the point that the matter is offensive in any way, but upon the general principle that we are not to listen here to any communication, directly or indirectly, from a foreign Government, except it comes through the regular channels. That, I understand, has ever been the rule in the Senate, and since I have been in the Senate this is the first time I have ever seen an attempt made to violate it.

Now, I do not object; the objection, as I understand it, is not made on the ground that it is disrespectful or that it attacks anyone, but upon the general principle that we shall have no communication with them; that we will not listen to anything from them. If they have any communication they desire to send to the public they must send it through the State Department. That is the principle upon which we have to act.

Mr. MORGAN. I was about making the same point that was made by the Senator from Colorado, that a question of order lies behind the question of the reading of the paper. That is for the Chair to decide. Whether the paper is in order and can be read here is the first question. Then the next question would be upon the objection made to its reading, whether the Senate desire to have it read. I think the first question in the case is one that the Chair must decide; that is to say, that the paper either is or is not in order. I make the point that the paper is not in order.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if this had been a communication sent by the minister from Spain to the Senate and not to the office of the Secretary of State there is no doubt whatever that there would be force in the point, but is it asserted that I can not have read here as furnishing facts in the discussion the statement that the Spanish minister has made in the newspapers, not pretending to approach us through diplomatic channels.

Mr. HOAR. Officially.

Mr. HALE. Not pretending to approach us by the avenues in any degree, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, officially; not claiming to be official, but simply as an indignant citizen of his own country filing a statement of facts. It is a most remarkable fact that Senators here are so sensitive, after having occupied days and days, and I may say weeks, in every form of denunciation against the Spanish Government and its course in Cuba, that when I, almost the first in the debate, have broken ground upon the other side, are so sensitive that they will not let the facts coming from this source—which is undoubted and unimpeachable, be put before the body. I am willing for the Senate to decide the question of order.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is that this is not calling for the reading of a paper contemplated by the rule. That applies to a case where a Senator demands to have a bill read over again or a resolution or a report. In this case the Senator from Maine is simply reading something in the course of his remarks and asking the Secretary to read it merely to relieve him from the physical labor of reading it. So the rule which has been called to the attention of the Senate does not apply to this question at all. The question is whether the Senator from Maine is in order in citing an unofficial newspaper communication as a part of his remarks when such communications have been cited on the other side a hundred times.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will ask the Senator if this paper is addressed to any officer of the Government or any official connected with the Government?

Mr. HALE. None whatever.

Mr. LINDSAY. Is it not in the nature of a résumé of the history of past events?

Mr. HALE. Precisely.

Mr. LINDSAY. Is there any greater reason for objecting to the reading of this paper than there would be if this gentleman in his private capacity had written a history of the events to which the paper refers?

Mr. HALE. It would be precisely like that. The Senator from Kentucky has struck at the root of the matter. It would be precisely in order as it would be if I asked to have read a page from some current history of events, or a page from Bancroft, or from McMaster, or from a newspaper, or from the message of President Grant on this subject.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the point of order will be withdrawn, and that after this is read the reply to it which was contained in this morning's Post from a prominent Cuban will also be read.

Mr. HALE. Certainly, after I am through if any Senator upon the other side desires to read what my colleague is pleased to term the reply to the Spanish minister's statement, I shall not object, because I have read it myself and I am entirely willing that it shall go for what it is worth here. If the point is insisted upon by the Senator from Minnesota, I can read this myself.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. DAVIS. I will withdraw the point of order in deference to the wishes of Senators.

Mr. HALE. Now, let the Secretary proceed with the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Senator SHERMAN, in the sitting of February 28, quoted freely, among other things, from an article published in a New York morning paper of Sunday, February 23. He said, giving in very strong language his opinion of the present commander-in-chief of the Spanish army in Cuba, the following: "A book was published in Spanish, which I am very sorry I can not get from the library, written by a Spaniard by the name of Enrique Donderio, who came over from Spain with the Spanish troops to see the war of 1872, and who was so horror-stricken with the high crimes that he saw committed that he flew to the United States, and there published his manuscript. Telling is this evidence, and it shows General Weyler," etc.

I have made an investigation about that book, and I have found that the name of the author is not Enrique Donderio, as originally printed, but Enrique Donderis. For this reason probably the Senator was unable to find the book in the Congressional Library. Should he have found it, he would have seen that in the book, which is a small pamphlet of 43 pages, not a single time the name of General Weyler is mentioned.

I have carefully read, and have had the pamphlet read by other persons, and I see in it that many horrors are described attributed both to the Spaniards and to the rebels, but in it, as I said before, and as I most emphatically affirm again, the name of General Weyler is not mentioned one single time. I have the book at the disposal of anybody who would like to controvert my statement.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me for a moment, as the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I presume that the resolution just read, as well as the conference report which is being discussed by the Senator from Maine, are privileged questions. I am of course anxious to proceed with the debate in the Delaware election case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the conference report may be proceeded with.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to understand what is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. This Cuban matter has been debated three or four days, and I hope we may finish it to-day. I take it as a matter of course that it will be disposed of to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the present, subject to call at any time.

Mr. GRAY. Without losing its place.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That it shall not be displaced, and with the understanding that I am at liberty to call it up at any moment, hoping, however, that the pending matter may be brought to a close within some reasonable time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GEORGE. I make a modified objection. I am very willing for the pending business to be laid aside to enable the Senator from Maine who is addressing the Senate to conclude his remarks, but I object to it any further.

Mr. FRYE. This is a privileged question. It is a conference report. No objection can be made.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator-elect from Delaware has a right to be here and vote on this privileged question. His title to a seat is a matter of higher privilege of the two.

Mr. FRYE. Both are privileged.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Both are privileged.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is not presented to the Chair in a way to be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I modify my request, and ask that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily until the Senator from Maine shall have concluded his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish it understood that at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Maine I shall insist upon this matter being disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has submitted to the Senate the request of the Senator from Oregon. That is all the Chair can do at this time in regard to the matter.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

I have been told that that person, Enrique Donderis, was a Spanish officer who fought in Spain against the Government, and was sent to Cuba. He fought there in the Spanish side, then deserted, and afterwards fought in the rebel ranks. But, although this fact has been stated by a Cuban sympathizer, it can not be vouched by me, and it is of no consequence.

What is important is that the honorable Senator from Ohio said in good faith that all the crimes that he related were attributed by Spanish authorities to General Weyler, and that his good faith has been imposed upon. General Weyler went to Cuba as a lieutenant-colonel in 1869, and returned to Spain as a brigadier-general in 1873. A part of the campaign he held the position of staff officer, he being one of the general staff, and some time later he held the position of colonel of a regiment of volunteers, which was made up and paid by the merchants of Habana. He defended the town of Holguin, being commander-general of that jurisdiction, but he has never had in Cuba other position than that of a subordinate officer.

In my investigations I have read many pamphlets written by Cubans during the war from 1868 to 1878, with all the natural bias when a contest is standing, and have failed to see the name of General Weyler recorded as responsible for the horrors that now, when he is at the head of the army against the rebels, are attributed to him.

MR. MORGAN AND HIS AUTHORITY.

Senator MORGAN, in the sitting of February 24, said that, according to official reports forwarded from Madrid by the United States minister, "13,600 Cubans had been killed in battle up to August, 1872, besides 43,500 prisoners, whom the Spanish minister admitted to have been put to death."

Senator MORGAN said that his authority was the American Cyclopedia. A friend of mine addressed Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., publishers of the cyclopedia, inquiring as to the authority of the book quoted by Senator MORGAN. In reply to his inquiry, Mr. Rossiter Johnson, associate editor of the American Cyclopedia, says that the article was written by Mr. Antonio Bachillery Morales, a Cuban, who was a decided and partial enemy of Spain, and that he presumes that it will be easy to get access to the official reports in the Department of State at Washington. I have accepted the advice, and in the State Department the following answer has been given me: "The minister of the United States to Spain, on the date of August 16, 1872, quoted from the Imparcial, described as a semiofficial journal of Madrid, of which the colony minister was the director until he entered the present cabinet, the following: 'From the beginning of the hostilities in Cuba 13,600 insurgents have been killed in battle, and 43,500 taken prisoners,' the minister adds, 'as it is believed that all prisoners of war taken are shot or garroted.'"

It is plain that the American minister, who was General Sickles, read the statement in a paper. The paper (El Imparcial) was owned by a cabinet minister (Señor Casset y Artime). General Sickles said, in a general way, that it was believed that the prisoners were all shot or garroted. Of course, that is not true; that simply is a belief, an opinion. From the expression of a belief an official report is made; from the statement in a newspaper that the prisoners were taken the conclusion that they were executed is derived, and because the Imparcial was the property of a minister of the cabinet the assertion is advanced that a cabinet officer admitted that they have been put to death. That has been said in the United States Senate and indorsed by a vote of that high body.

MR. LODGE AND A GARBLED INTERVIEW.

Senator CABOT LODGE, in a speech made on the 25th of February, quoted from the Liberal, of Madrid, an interview sent by telegraph from Cadiz in the moment in which General Weyler embarked for Cuba. The translation which has been given to the Senator from Massachusetts is a fraud. My attention was called to it by a telegram from Mr. Taltavull, correspondent in the United States of the Liberal, from Madrid, and a former member of the Cortes. This distinguished gentleman wired to me: "General Weyler never said, in any interview or conversation published in the Liberal, that he would exterminate the filibusters. What he said was that he would clean out the western provinces of Cuba of filibusters, and that he would exterminate the small bands of bandits." I have now before me the text of that interview. I will not stop to discuss the historical importance of a nonauthorized interview. But, even taking as granted that General Weyler said what is printed, the words that the person who has furnished documents to Senator CABOT LODGE have made him pronounce are not exact. The exact translation of what General Weyler said is: "On my arrival to Cuba I propose in the first place to clean out of filibusters the provinces of Habana, Pinar del Rio, and Las Villas; be it well understood that I refer for the moment to the large bands which have invaded them. Then will remain the small bands of bandits, which I will exterminate gradually."

Nobody can believe that General Weyler in the word "exterminate" meant to put to death; but even if that sense is applied to his words, it is necessary to understand what those bands of bandits in Cuba are and have been. I would like to know the opinion that the American planters, respectable, law-abiding citizens, who are working for their own interests and for the prosperity of Cuba, have in that respect; what would be done in this country with the people who have been kidnaping and blackmailing the honest toilers living out in the country. What treatment do they think deserve people like Manuel Garcia, Mirabal, Matagas, Perico Delgado, and others? The paper to which I refer is at the disposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, and of anybody who wants to see it.

CRUELTIES OF WAR.

I can not understand how all rules of war that have been given by all civilized nations are so criminal, so cruel, and so tyrannical when they are applied to Cuba. I have before my eyes a summary of charges of inhumanity in connection with the war of the rebellion in the United States to both sides, taken from American history. I am sure that many of them are false, most of them exaggerated, some necessary, and others unavoidable. But, taking only as an illustration and for the sake of argument what I see in that list, I can not understand how people who are familiar with those necessary evils of war have been able to use such harsh, unjust, and offensive language against Spain.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary may read the extracts which are cited there from contemporaneous literature about the struggle in America, which show how unreliable these are.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

In an English paper of those days I read the following opinion of the American civil war: "Stripped of its trappings, it is a mere quarrel for territory. The antagonists are acting like Delawares and Pawnees. War to the knife, pushed to absolute extermination, is what they have resolved on, and people breathe a language of massacre and extermination."

Mr. HALE. I will not ask the Secretary to read further.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Secretary had better read the remainder.

Mr. DAVIS. He had better read the remainder.

Mr. HALE. Very well. I have no objection to any of it being read. The Secretary may go on and finish all that is there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

This charge was no more justified than the charges which are brought now against Spain. I said nothing when that language was used in the press, but I believe it is my duty, although against the conventionalities of my position, to appeal, as I have said, to the honest common sense of the American people when those words are uttered from the Capitol of the United States.

Nothing is now done in Cuba that has not been done and has not been deemed necessary in other countries when at war. It would be possible and easy for me to quote many facts not different from those which now arouse public sentiment against Spain. I will only ask persons wanting an impartial and honest opinion to read what the commanders in chief of the American armies on both sides and what those of the armies of France and Germany have deemed necessary for the protection of their soldiers and the carrying out of the war.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as bearing upon the actual condition——

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HALE. I will yield for a question. I do not want the thread of my remarks broken into by anything.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I will state to the Senator what I want him to yield for. Under the unanimous-consent agreement just entered into, I understand that this debate is to close with the remarks of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; not at all. There was no such agreement made.

Mr. HALE. There will be ample opportunity, of course, for debate.

Mr. MORGAN. My purpose was to ask the consent of the Senator in his time, while he is on the floor, to read the reply of some of the representatives of Cuba here to that statement.

Mr. HALE. That may well come in when any Senator on the other side chooses to discuss the question.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator declines to let it come in now, then? I wanted it to go along with the accusation.

Mr. HALE. As bearing upon the actual condition in Cuba, I have here a piece of testimony not concocted in the offices of the organ or organs of the insurrection, but coming from the Cuban correspondent of a great newspaper whose sympathies have been pronounced from the beginning in favor of the insurgents. That great metropolitan newspaper is the New York World, and here is the last utterance of its well-known correspondent. Some Senators here and others know the writer well. He is Mr. William Shaw Bowen, and writes from the Island of Cuba, and his communication appears in one of the last issues of the World. This is to be said for the World, that in its desire to make a great and complete newspaper it admits statements and testimony from both sides. Here is the last statement of Mr. Bowen, written to the World from Cuba, bearing upon the situation there, and I ask the Secretary to read it carefully.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

Mr. HALE. This is a witness taken from the other camp, who is compelled by his character and his duty to his newspaper to tell the truth.

The Secretary read as follows:

General Weyler has, in my opinion, been grossly traduced. I should add I feel confident that it is owing to misinformation, to an erroneous prejudice, to systematic attacks on him personally by interested enemies that the people of the United States and their public representatives have formed a monstrously erroneous opinion about the governor-general. The question of loyal politics does not enter into the subject. No matter whether a man is an ultra-Spanish Monarchist, a Liberal, a Home Ruler, or a Separatist rebel, there is no occasion to speak untruly about an individual who is in opposition to his views.

Campos spoke kindly of Gomez personally and I have yet to hear that General Weyler does otherwise. I see that the American newspapers publish charges that prisoners are ill treated and killed by summary execution. Here again is an incorrect representation of facts. I have been striving for autonomy for many years. I have ardently labored in the Cortes to secure all possible reforms and benefits that could ameliorate the condition of Cuba. I love my country, Cuba, and I will do all in my power to advance her interest. When I speak as I do I think I do so disinterestedly and fairly.

I am astonished to perceive how unacquainted with the true conditions are the public men in Washington. When Cuba lies so close to the borders of the United States it would be supposed a much wider intelligence concerning the internal affairs of the island would exist. If the book said to have been quoted in Congress against General Weyler was by Enrique Donderis, I never heard of its author. I fancy it is a nom de plume.

WILLIAM SHAW BOWEN.

Mr. HALE. I will put that testimony, from a witness in Cuba, and its statement of the lack of real information that we have on the subject, against anything that was written or will be produced here by any Cuban who is at present in Washington seeking to answer a fair, cool, calm, and dispassionate statement of the Spanish minister.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the dispatch just read from Cuba?

Mr. HALE. From a correspondent.

Mr. MORGAN. From Cuba?

Mr. HALE. Sent from Cuba.

Mr. MORGAN. That does not appear from what has been read.

Mr. HALE. It went through the New York World, as the Senator knows very well.

Mr. MORGAN. I know how they get there, of course.

Mr. HALE. There is a great deal that pretends to come from Cuba of a different kind. This is the utterance of a conservative, well-known man, who does not strain his statement through the authorities, but sends it direct to his newspaper, and the paper publishes it.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator whether it came by telegraph or by mail?

Mr. HALE. I do not remember the date. I think it came by telegraph, though I am not certain.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it came by telegraph it would be under censorship; if it came by mail it would not.

Mr. HALE. I do not know. It is a late communication selected from the World. I have not the least doubt that it is exactly as the correspondent of that enterprising paper wrote it.

Mr. President, while a large part of this creation of excesses, outrages, and atrocities on the side of the Spaniards and the Spanish Government has fallen, I have here a piece of testimony, taken from a Cuban sympathizing newspaper in New York, giving what purports to be—and giving it exultingly—an account of certain operations by the insurgents on their side. I ask the Senate's careful attention to it when a little later I will have it read.

Mr. President, I do not suppose that any warfare is conducted on the Island of Cuba as it would be in the United States. I do not suppose that either side is guiltless. I know that the provocation to the constituted authorities is great. The raids of the insurgents, the destruction of property, their wanton disregard of every rule of law is such that it undoubtedly has provoked extreme, urgent, forcible, severe action upon the other side. If my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], who is in the habit of reading good history, and brings the wealth of its illustrations into his speeches here, will read anew the history of the peninsula campaign under the conduct of Wellington upon the British side, and one and another of the defeated marshals of Napoleon on the other side, he will find constantly all the way through this guerrilla warfare on the part of those whom France considered guerrillas and insurgents against the existing Spanish Government. It was after Joseph Bonaparte had been crowned at Madrid and recognized as King on a throne upon which he would have remained as firmly seated as the Hapsburgs, or the Brandenburgs, or the Romanoffs, if it had not been for the war between England and France and the English army, which did the real fighting. The Spanish guerrillas would never have made headway against the French.

I do not claim that everything goes on in the Island of Cuba and in the conflicts there as it would go on under an Anglo-Saxon people. We are dealing with another race, and I now come to the piece of testimony showing the manner in which the insurgents are doing their fighting, if indeed it can be called legitimate fighting, struggling for liberty—if that is the phrase—taken from the New York Journal. The heading is:

Maceo's great raid—The insurgent general has devastated the whole of Pinar del Rio.

That is the name of a province. The next heading is:

Thirteen towns burned—All the tobacco crops destroyed and people wandering about without clothing.

What is the next heading?

Spain beaten everywhere.

That is the method, Mr. President, that the insurgents are taking to beat Spain everywhere—"thirteen towns burned; all the tobacco crop destroyed"—"people wandering about without clothing." Here is the report in full, with further heading:

The true story of the result of the raid made by Antonio Maceo into Pinar del Rio is beginning to crop out. So effectual was the work of the insurgent general that 13 towns held by the Spaniards have been destroyed and the rich tobacco lands throughout the province have been laid waste. Practically all of the island west of Habana is a wilderness. This news has heretofore been suppressed by the Spanish censors, and it is believed that matters are much worse than the news depicts.

The reopening of telegraphic communication with the region of Pinar del Rio brings the first detailed information of affairs in that province for several weeks.

This is where the insurgents had been with their bands in possession of this territory for several weeks, and were at last driven out, when the Spanish troops occupied the territory, and then, as this Cuban organ says, for the first time light was let in on the situation. Now, let us see how these patriots in their struggle for freedom dealt with this province:

The condition of affairs disclosed is little less than appalling. The rich Vuelto Abajo tobacco district seems to have been put to the torch and is apparently reduced to a wilderness.

Whole towns have been obliterated or reduced to a heap of ashes, and their inhabitants are wandering helpless over the face of the country, without a place to lay their heads or wherewithal to be clothed, and many of them starving.

TOWNS DESTROYED.

The villages and towns of Cabanas, Bahia Honda, San Diego de Nunez, Santa Cruz de los Pinos, Los Palacios, Piso Real de San Diego, and San Diego de los Banos are known to be reduced to ashes, and reports of others will bring the number destroyed up to thirteen. All of these were important and thriving centers of population and business.

The last town which has succumbed to the insurgents' torch is San Juan y Martinez. The tobacco from this town is famous the world over to all connoisseurs for its matchless flavor. Its cultivation brought great wealth to the people of the district and gave material for a large commerce in the town and support to over 1,000 families.

San Juan de Martinez is, however, no more.

WAITING FOR HELP.

When the first column of Spanish troops arrived on the site of the town they found only débris and smoking ashes, and all around a seemingly limitless sea of fire. A hundred desolate families had taken refuge in poor huts outside of what was once the town and were waiting helplessly for any assistance that would save them from starvation. They were without clothes and without food and saw no prospect ahead in their despair of securing either.

San Juan y Martinez is erased from the map. The adjoining town of San Luis had a narrow escape from the same fate, but escaped almost by a miracle. The inhabitants had already fled outside, seeking a refuge from the flames which the torch was ready to apply, when General Cornell, at the head of a detachment of troops, made his appearance on the scene, and the insurgents evacuated the town.

Such is the result of Maceo's raid.

A committee representing the Chamber of Commerce and the Spanish Casino called upon Captain-General Weyler to-day and assured him of their patriotic adhesion to him in his policy.

WEYLER'S PROCLAMATION.

In consequence of the distribution of a circular containing General Weyler's proclamation requiring the concentration of all country people within the limits of the towns for protection, there have been many delegations of farmers coming to Santiago de Cuba to inquire of the military authorities how far the requirement applies to them and for an interpretation of its provisions. The consuls of foreign governments are seeking the same information.

Generals Bernal and Vicuna have arrived here for a conference with Captain-General Weyler.

That is announced by a Cuban organ as the way in which "Spain is beaten everywhere."

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend just there, if it does not interrupt him, whether that is not a state of belligerency, as stated in the resolution?

Mr. HALE. I am coming to that. I knew what the Senator would say.

That recital of the way in which "Spain is beaten everywhere," to use the language of this communication and of this organ, is something horrible. I do not take it from a hostile paper; I take its exulting details, with the headings, from a paper sympathizing with the insurrection and getting reports from its own correspondents.

Mr. President, liberty does not fight its battles in that way.

Freedom has risen
Oft from prison bars,
Oft from battle flashes,
Oft from heroes' lips,
Oftenest from their ashes.

But it does not rise from the horror and conflagration and devil's work that is recited by this Cuban organ. Men turn from this with disgust and shame. The blood that is stirred, the pulse that leaps, at the story of Bannockburn and Sempach and Worcester and Bunker Hill and Yorktown turn with loathing from this mass of horrors.

Mr. President, it is not even war; it is not even battle; it is incendiarism; it is the torch of destruction; it is pillage; it is murder; it is outrage. It is what Faulconbridge calls "the wildest stroke of savagery." If I vote alone, I shall vote for no resolution which gives aid and comfort to the red-handed foray of this guerrilla leader whose exploits are so exultantly chronicled as I have read them here.

I had in the headings or catch words of what my remarks follow, for I have no written speech, the very point suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] just now—"Is this belligerency, and ought the Spaniards to suppress it?" That is a fair question. I anticipated it would be asked. It is in my notes as a thing to be answered.

Senators will say, with this condition in the Island of Cuba unsuppressed, unexterminated by Spain, how long shall the United States wait and allow it to go on? That very question was put to the United States over and over again by the diplomatists of England and France during the years of our war for the suppression of the rebellion, and there, Mr. President, was the real danger line which the great men who stood at the head of our affairs always dreaded. There was no end to the men that we raised; our credit was illimitable; our commanders disclosed and developed tactics and mastery of strategy in the battlefield that entitled them to rank with Frederick and Wellington and Napoleon; in all these we had no lack; but the weak point all of the time was the danger of foreign intervention to recognize the independence of the Southern Confederacy upon the ground that a condition of warfare existed and that it was the duty of the United States to suppress the rebellion; and that, if it did not, these powers would interfere. Early and late—I have the volume of correspondence here, and it is most interesting to read—the foreign offices at Paris and at London, whenever any reverse attended our arms, at once asked the question which the Senator from Ohio has asked me, whether the news which had come by telegraph across the ocean did not disclose a condition of obdurate, unconquerable resistance, and whether the United States was prepared to say when it would suppress the rebellion. This burden, Mr. President, was what rested most heavily upon the heads of those who were at the front of our affairs at that time. It was this danger which gave that added stoop to the tall form of Abraham Lincoln; it was this that caused the optimism of Seward to take on a sadder turn than it ever had before; it was this danger and the vigils depending upon it that broke down the lion-hearted Stanton and left him a wreck when peace came; it was the anxiety lest foreign powers, asking the same question the Senator from Ohio has asked me, would interfere, and the answer is found in the dispatches that Secretary Seward sent to the French foreign office and to the British foreign office.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, before a single battle was fought in that civil war of ours Spain, England, and France acknowledged the belligerency of the Confederacy in the very language contained in this resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Were they acting rightly?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I do not think they were acting rightly.

Mr. HALE. I do not think they were.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we have waited year after year and seen this tyranny and oppression almost on our shores, and have never yet raised a single helping hand nor said a single kindly word to the struggling people of Cuba.

Mr. HALE. I am not talking about belligerency now; I am talking about what the Senator suggested by his question, of the danger in 1861–1865 that foreign powers would interfere further; and they asked the same question. The dispatches sent from the foreign office at Paris through Lord John Russell and the communications with Lord Lyons and Sir Frederick Bruce, and those of the French office to its minister here, are full to teeming with the statements that the war was being so prolonged and had continued so many years, as the Senator says about this outbreak, that humanity called upon the European powers to further recognize the independence of the Confederacy.

What was the answer? It is found in this volume [exhibiting]; it is found in more than one place; and it amounts to simply this: The answer that Secretary Seward made is the answer that I now make to the Senator from Ohio. Mr. Seward said: "The United States is engaged in the herculean task of attempting to suppress the greatest rebellion in the history of man; it is able to do it." But he said further to our minister in Paris, Mr. Dayton, and our minister in London, Charles Francis Adams: "I desire you in the most respectful manner to communicate to the foreign office this attitude of the American Government upon this question: The United States will suppress the rebellion; but it must do it in its own way. The method under which it shall be done must be selected by us, and no matter what complications may arise, no matter what dangers may environ us from further complications with foreign powers, no foreign power will be allowed to interfere with the United States in their method of suppressing the rebellion." And that is the answer to-day. This must be left to Spain. She sent troops there by the thousand and tens of thousands; she sent skilled commanders. She has to deal with the most difficult guerrilla warfare the world has ever seen. The condition of the island, its topography, everything in relation to it, is such that it encourages guerrilla warfare. As we waited, and as Europe waited, the United States, by every precedent set by our Government in its relations with European powers, must let Spain have a fair opportunity of suppressing this rebellion. It is not the first one. General Grant said they were "periodic." They are. The message which I quoted from General Grant, in 1870, was followed by another message just like it in 1875; and we are taught there the self-restraining lesson that in some of these things we must do what the European powers did when Mr. Seward answered that the United States would settle the rebellion in its own manner.

The British diplomatists and the French diplomatists retired grumblingly and mutteringly; but they kept hands off, Mr. President.

With interruptions and otherwise, I am taking more time than I intended, but I should like to address myself briefly to Spain's attitude in this matter toward the United States in this present matter. I have here—and it is another instance of the New York World's enterprise—a communication from the premier, Castillio del Canovas, in which he announces the Spanish policy. He does not hide in the darkness and lurking places of cabinet closets, but he comes forth boldly, manfully, and bravely, and announces to the world, to Congress, to the Senate, what the Spanish policy is. I have rarely seen a more composed and self-respecting statement than this. Even in view of the denunciations to which Spain has been subjected here and elsewhere, the Spanish minister preserves his dignity and self-respect; and the communication which I hold here is to the credit of the Spanish Government under sore temptation to be querulous and complaining, and to use retaliatory language. There is nothing of it here. He says:

THE POLICY OF SPAIN DECLARED.

[Cable message from the prime minister at Madrid to the people of America, through the World.]

MADRID, March 6.

To JOSEPH PULITZER, World, New York:

We have as yet no official notification of the intentions of the American Government, and can not, therefore, take cognizance of or protest by note against any of the proceedings of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States. We have taken no official notice whatever of the proceedings and speeches in Washington during the past week.

Nor have we sounded the European powers or courts regarding their support in any form. All we have done is to show to the American Government and to Minister Taylor that we have endeavored to enforce respect for the American legation and consulates, repressing so sternly the disturbances that we have ordered the Madrid, Granada, Barcelona, and Valencia universities closed, and we will close all universities, schools, and establishments whose students dare to make demonstrations hostile to the United States. We will send to prison and prompt trial all the authors and promoters of such disturbances. We believe they are prompted by the advanced republicans.

Nothing will be omitted on our side to show our desire to preserve cordial relations with America. And I am convinced that we possess sufficient means to quell any hostile demonstrations.

That is what Seward told the minister of Louis Napoleon and the British cabinet in the years between 1861 and 1864.

The Government of Spain regrets and has made all the amends possible for the manifestation already made of the indignation which the speeches at Washington naturally excited among the ever-loyal people of Spain.

Does any Senator desire more? One can understand the passionate outbreak of Spanish blood on finding their country denounced as it has been and the emeutes and risings that took place, not significant, indeed, and which were at once put down by the Spanish Government in a friendly spirit to the United States.

The situation—

Says the prime minister—

now is one of extreme delicacy. Indeed, I can not define how far it is possible for the Government of Spain to permit amicable and careful mediation of a foreign power, however honorable and disinterested it may be, without incurring the grave risk of being accused of submitting to outside interference, pressure, and dictation in the midst of a civil war.

There are portions of Mr. Seward's dispatches to the foreign offices of England and France using almost exactly the precise language used here by the Spanish premier.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator observe that the prime minister apparently admits a state of public war when he talks about a "civil war"?

Mr. HALE. Of course the phrase "civil war" is a general phrase used, descriptive, perhaps, of a conflict that entitles to belligerency, and quite as likely to a conflict that does not entitle to belligerency. It is conflict; it is outbreak. I have shown what form it takes in Cuba.

The United States—

are a great power, and until they recognize the object and encourage the aims of the insurrectionists in Cuba they are friendly to Spain. After the recognition of the belligerents in Cuba by the United States it would be impossible for the Government of Spain to accept the good offices of President Cleveland, or to permit any interference whatever.

There, Mr. President, is the danger of these resolutions; there is where the Senate should have called a halt when it voted before. Therein lurks the ever-present danger.

Says the prime minister further:

Nevertheless, I still hope some means will be found by the President to avoid alienating the friendly relations with the United States, which Spain has shown this week that she prizes highly.

I am fully alive to the significance and the possible consequences of the vote of the United States Congress to the rebels as well as to Spain in her relations with the United States, especially in connection with the right of search on the high seas and in the matter of privateers and filibustering expeditions.

The only new and seemingly warlike preparations yet made by Spain are made simply with a view to equipping a fleet of war ships and transatlantic steamers to chase filibusters and to guard the coasts of Cuba. That is the sole object in view. General Weyler having said that he has had enough troops, only the usual reliefs will be sent to Cuba until autumn, and no naval demonstration is contemplated.

The elections will not interfere with the action of the Government, as it intends to conduct them in a tolerant spirit for all parties, fair representation being arranged for even the West Indian constituencies. Besides, in every imperial and international question the Spaniards have always shown a patriotic spirit.

The misapprehension concerning General Weyler's character and methods as a soldier originated in a misstatement of facts in his career and of his assignments and instructions. Both in Cuba twenty years ago and in the Philippine Islands since then Weyler has only carried out the orders of his chiefs.

Before he left for Cuba the last time I saw and spoke to him and approved his views. Consequently, he has simply acted in harmony with the requirements of this war, in which the insurgents have not only set at defiance the rules of civilized warfare, but have violated the provisions of the treaty of 1795 between Spain and the United States, and of the protocol of 1877, respecting the lives and the property of all real and alleged American citizens in Cuba.

I am determined to carry out the administrative political reforms already voted by the Cortes as soon as the pacificaton of the island permits, and even such economical tariff reforms as may be consistent with the interests of both the colony and the mother country.

But it is impossible to attempt reforms during a civil war or under any foreign pressure in the present condition of the island.

When Marshal Campos was sent to Cuba as governor-general the Government would certainly have allowed him to institute the reforms if he had deemed them advisable. But he soon discovered that it was impossible to do so.

We can not admit that the slightest ground exists for the recognition of the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents, whose so-called President, the Marquis of Santa Lucia, and the members of his executive council are nomads, like the rebel bands, ever on the move. For instance, they were nearly surprised and captured this week by a Spanish column in the province of Las Villas.

CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO.

I have no admiration for many things that have taken place in the course of Spain's history. I know that history is deformed by persecution, by bigotry. The world knows that; but it is an old, high-spirited, resentful nation; and the utterance there made candidly by the prime minister ought to give us pause before we pass resolutions declaring in terms the belligerency of the insurgents and their equality with the Spanish Government before the law.

There is one man in Spain, Mr. President, who has held a warm place in the affections of the American people and in the affections and respect of civilized peoples throughout the globe. He has made effort and suffered for freedom. He is in politics a republican and not a monarchist. He has been connected with significant events in Spanish history, representing and leading the patriotic republican movement. He is Emilio Castelar, and this emergency is such that it has brought him from his private life. The heart of this old man is warm to the present danger of the situation, and he has felt that, from his place of retirement, where he had gone, as he believed, forever from public affairs, and it may be from public notice, he should address a fervid but candid remonstrance.

Numberless Americans—

have cabled to me asking my opinion, as you have done. I beg that all of them will consider this as an answer in reply to your questions.

I may say that I consider any negotiations respecting Cuba between Spain and the United States would be impossible from the moment that the belligerency of the insurgents should be declared.

Mr. GEORGE. Whose language is that?

Mr. HALE. Castelar's, the great Spanish republican.

I judge the situation serious, but if the insurgents are not recognized as belligerents the Spanish revolutionary republican party can do nothing internally, as they are completely disorganized, but in case an international conflict should be provoked, I should give all the assistance in my power to the Government.

The old man becomes earnest in his appeal.

You say America hears me. I believed so once, but advancing age has dispelled the illusion.

There is something pathetic in this old lion of republicanism, who had retired from public life, with all his great record of services to the cause of liberty in the past, and the sacrifices that he has made, saying that he believed once that the American people would listen to him, but under the light of the events that have taken place in the last fortnight here, that belief, he says, has fled from his breast. He touches upon what has been alluded to in the debate—the failure of Spain to put into effect the provisions of the treaty granting reform to Cuba.

With permission of the Senate I will insert a further portion of the address in my remarks, and it will follow here:

You do not, and I affirmed you would not, recognize the insurgents. I still believe President Cleveland will not do so, and that you will support him.

You will not violate international law, as your Parliament has done, with a declaration for recognition of belligerency, which attacks the principle of nonintervention proclaimed by your democratic traditions.

It is impossible to subject Cuba to your rule, as Cuba is fevered with the spirit of independence. It would be impossible for you to keep Cuba, for she is as democratic as Spain. I say this—I, who belonged to the generation that suppressed the slave trade, slavery, religious intolerance, the old colonial régime, and proclaimed the liberties the world admires.

The Cuban insurrection broke out at the instant when the unanimous vote of all parties had just given Cuba liberal laws, and we were preparing to give her wide decentralization, self-government, and all possible free trade.

You were born to clear the skies of the thunder of war. Let us have peace. You can not expel Spain from America because, even though America were submerged under the ocean, the wakes of the caravels of our discoverers would shine across the waves and the winds would forever sound eternally the name of the creatrix—Spain.

EMILIO CASTELAR.

Mr. HALE. I will not contrast the tone of these communications of these great men representing Spain, with the interest and fate of her Government and her future depending, and with much temptation to exacerbation of spirit—I will not contrast the language in which they are couched or the spirit that pervades them with certain other declarations to which some of us have listened. I say that under all conditions, under present circumstances, the attitude of Spain, as disclosed by all the communications that I have brought before the Senate to-day, is one of dignity and proper self-asserting respect.

Mr. President, it is not a gracious nor an easy task to stand up and oppose, or even question, the conduct of any people or any cause that claims to be acting under the sacred desire for human liberty. I realize that. I am fully aware how natural it is, especially for the people of the United States, to sympathize with struggling communities seeking to go free. I should hope, sir, that this will never be changed. I should hope that the American breast will beat responsive to the real cause of any struggling people who essay to accomplish freedom.

But, Mr. President, I can not help being possessed with the gravest doubt as to whether the condition in Cuba to-day discloses any such struggle. The sacred name of freedom, the desire of liberty are of course invoked. I do not deny that there has been misgovernment in Cuba, but misgovernment is not applied to and is not localized alone in Cuba. There is the gravest mismanagement and misgovernment in all South America, in Central America, in Turkey, and in other States, and we are not wholly free from misgovernment in the United States. There are communities, there are municipalities, there are States that furnish instances of misgovernment, and the United States, great and powerful as it is, has not yet assumed the mission to go forth and correct every form of human misgovernment. Much of that must be left to the curative effects of time.

Out of this imperfect presentation of the case I discover one real danger, and that, Mr. President, is possible war. I am not ready for war. I deprecate it. I do not believe the people of the United States desire war. While there is a great deal of what is called war sentiment pervading the country, occupying it, possessing the columns of newspapers, and finding utterance here and in the other branch, the sober common sense of the American people, depend upon it, sir, is not for war. I do not think we are prepared for war. I hope we are sufficiently prepared for war to command peace, but I do not think that in case of actual conflict, war being declared within three months from now, the United States could go into war with any great advantage. I am not in favor of seeking opportunities to inflame friendly powers even under the attempt to establish a belligerent condition of a people who are said to be struggling for liberty. I am not in favor of inciting war, and I do not think the American people believe in it.

Mr. President, the struggle of the American Revolution and the successful emergence of the colonies from that Revolution and the setting up here of the Republic of the United States gave to this country eighty years of peace accompanied by a prosperity that was the exemplar and the wonder of the world. The minor conflicts that took place in those eighty years were so light that they never touched the life of the people or its conditions and do not need to be mentioned. Speaking generally, it was a time of profound peace that we had earned by the American Revolution of 1776. At the end of that period of peace there fell upon the United States a conflict so vast, so appalling that the sceptics who doubted whether the Government could maintain itself almost overcame in numbers those who believed the United States could maintain the integrity of the Republic. But out of four years of destructive and devastating war at last the Republic emerged with its standards floating everywhere over successful battlefields and a rebellion crushed. That most mighty and superhuman effort entitles the United States to another eighty years of profound peace and prosperity. No higher wish, no greater benediction could be invoked upon us than that there should follow, as did follow the American Revolution, this period of nearly three generations of peace and the thrift and prosperity that come with peace for the United States.

I for one have been disturbed and made anxious by the growth of what I may call the aggressive spirit as shown particularly within the last year, not only here but elsewhere, the desire to aggress, the desire to incite trouble, the desire to make difficulties with foreign powers, the dealing with the discussion, the imagery of war rather than of peace, the turning aside of the plowshare and the pruning hook and giving men's attention to the sword and the rifle. It is what the books call "militarism," and I for one deprecate it. It is unsound in its foundation. It is a dangerous plant. It has but one result. When militarism takes possession of the mind and of the imagination of a great, powerful, chivalric people there is but one result—it absorbs all other things. The interests and the arts of peace become neglected, and the attention and the ambitions of men are directed in another line, and some day or other, no matter whether it be a Republic or what it be, a people dominated by militarism are open to the grasp of the strong hand of some great military chieftain.

I do not believe that this is present to us as a near danger, but certainly the events of the last few months were well described by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in one of those trenchant phrases with which he is in the habit of entertaining us when he said that "every morning somebody feels that he ought to fire off a loaded cannon against somebody else." Out of it I believe the good sense of the American people will assert itself. It will show that it loves peace—this people—and not war. So, notwithstanding the danger that I am trying to avert, notwithstanding war stands in my mind as a possible danger, I believe that we shall come out of it without war, and that there will be for us that long period of peace and prosperity that we deserve.

We have many things that Congress should turn its attention to besides foreign affairs. Under the leadership of some of the oldest and hitherto most conservative Senators we have given large attention to foreign complications in the present Congress. I do not believe that this is going to obtain in the future. I believe that the American honor will always be asserted. I believe that every doctrine that is necessary for our preservation as a great nation and which is necessary to patriotism and to love of liberty will be asserted and maintained with a calmness and serious strength that will impress every foreign power so that there never will be need for war. I do not expect to see, or that anyone here will see, war.

Mr. President, in looking at this bright future as I forecast it for the United States, I think of that magnificent apostrophy to peace which Shakespeare puts into the mouth of Archbishop Cranmer when he predicted the future of the royal babe, she who became England's great Queen Elizabeth.

I can but hope that the glowing words will apply to this Republic in the years to come as they were meant for Elizabeth and for England:

> She shall be lov'd and fear'd; her own shall bless her:
> Her foes shake like a field of beaten corn,
> And hang their heads with sorrow; good grows with her;
> In her days every man shall eat in safety,
> Under his own vine, what he plants; and sing
> The merry songs of peace to all his neighbors.
> God shall be truly known; and those about her
> From her shall read the perfect ways of honor,
> And by those claim their greatness, not by blood.

Mr. President, when the last of us shall close his eyes in death I hope and believe that those eyes will rest on a scene such as the greatest of English poets has thus so loftily pictured.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The unfinished business will be considered as being laid before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to consult——

Mr. TURPIE. I believe I am entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio was recognized by the Chair in reference to the order of business.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do anything the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] desires. If he wishes to speak this evening I will yield to him, although I do think it is not exactly according to the ordinary course of business, because the report of a conference committee is especially privileged and overrides even the claim to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the Senator from Ohio not to insist upon proceeding with the Cuban matter this evening. There are some others who wish to discuss it. I have something to say myself, and I should like to be heard to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana, and will retain the floor on the Cuban resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will state that so far as I am concerned I am absolutely indifferent as to which of these privileged questions is proceeded with for the remainder of the day, whether it be the Delaware case or the Cuban matter. Whichever course is agreeable to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] will be satisfactory to me. If they can arrange the matter to suit themselves, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. HOAR. There are some Senators who would like to speak upon the Cuban question who do not wish to proceed to-day, and I hope, therefore, that that question will not be further proceeded with to-day. I should like to have read—though I do not understand any point is now to be decided, as the Senator from Ohio has alluded to what he considers to be the parliamentary law—the rule in regard to proceeding with a claim to a seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first paragraph of Rule VI will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE VI.

PRESENTATION OF CREDENTIALS.

1. The presentation of the credentials of Senators-elect and other questions of privilege shall always be in order, except during the reading and correction of the Journal, while a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and all questions and motions arising or made upon the presentation of such credentials shall be proceeded with until disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask to have the other rule read.

Mr. HARRIS. Let Rule XXVII be read. It refers directly to this question.

Mr. MILLS. I suggest that the Senator from Indiana be permitted to proceed. We are all willing to allow him to proceed with his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule XXVII will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XXVII.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES.

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate, which is the resolution for the admission of Mr. Du Pont as a Senator from the State of Delaware.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon from the Committee on Privileges and Elections February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections have taken the position, and will maintain it, that the claimant in this case, Henry A. Du Pont, was not chosen a member of this body, and is not entitled to a seat therein. The majority of the committee have the affirmative of the issue. They have the burden of proof. The record in the case contained in the journal, both of the senate and the house of the State of Delaware, shows that on the day and date when it was claimed the petitioner was elected a United States Senator there were 30 members of the legislature of Delaware present in joint convention who took part therein; that there were 30 votes cast for United States Senator; that the claimant received 15 votes; that an equal number, 15 votes, were given to other gentlemen named at that time as candidates, and that there was no election. Such is the record.

The claim of the petitioner in this case is a contradiction, clear, unequivocal, of the record—a record which imports absolute verity. The pretension in this case is an impeachment of the record, which in its very nature is capable neither of denial nor impeachment. Such is the position of the claimant, and such is the burden of proof which the supporters of his pretension in this case have assumed.

It is set up as a reason for maintaining the position of the majority that Mr. William T. Watson, a senator of the State of Delaware from the county of Kent, and speaker of the senate, voted and acted in joint convention; and it is alleged against his right to do so that some time before, about a month before that time, the governor of the State of Delaware had died and that the exercise of the duties of the office had devolved upon said William T. Watson, speaker of the senate and a senator from the county of Kent. It is claimed by the majority that by reason of the devolution of the exercise of the office, by the death of the governor, upon this member of the State senate and speaker of the State senate, he ceased at that time either to be a senator or speaker of the senate, and was not, therefore, entitled to act and vote as a member of the joint assembly.

This temporary provision for the exercise of executive authority is found in section 14, page 29, of the edition I have of the constitution of the State of Delaware. It reads as follows:

> Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

Now, sir, I think if any man of ordinary understanding or intelligence (and the constitutions of our States were made by such men and for such men) were asked upon whom devolved the exercise of the executive office of the State upon the death of the governor, he would answer upon the speaker of the senate. If he were asked how long this devolution lasts, he would say until a governor was elected by the people and qualified. If he were asked on the first day of this temporary period, the day the governor died, who is to exercise the executive office, he would answer, the speaker of the senate. If he were asked in the middle of such temporary interim who is to exercise or does exercise the office, he would answer, the speaker of the senate. And if at the very close, on the day before the new governor was inaugurated, such person were asked who was exercising the office of executive now, or who is entitled to exercise it, he would answer, the speaker of the senate.

The future expression in this phrase "shall exercise" demands special attention. The phrase is not only imperative, but it is a future imperative looking beyond the present, and especially when you use the next word in the collocation, "shall exercise until," it will be seen that the whole scope of the temporary power—of the exercise of the power—of him who is speaker of the senate is in the future.

Necessarily, then, the speaker must be and continue for that future period the officer as he is first designated. The speaker must remain speaker; he does remain speaker. It is because he is speaker and remains speaker that he exercises the executive authority, for if, as is contended for by the other side, at the very beginning of the exercise of the executive authority he ceases to be speaker or is suspended from the office of speaker or the office of senator, how can the speaker, be said to exercise the office for the future? How can it be said of him in any way he "shall exercise"; the speaker must exercise eo nomine for that future period the office of governor. If he ceases to be speaker, if he is suspended from his functions as speaker, he would then be no longer the officer designated by the constitution ipsissimis verbis, he would no longer be the official designated in the words and letter of the constitution to make the temporary supply in the exercise of the executive office.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will not interrupt the Senator at all if he dislikes it or if it disturbs him, but if it does not disturb him I wish to ask him a question right at this point.

Mr. TURPIE. I heard the Senator for six hours——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I shall not interrupt the Senator from Indiana if it will disturb him. I concede that the Senator did not interrupt me once.

Mr. TURPIE. And I never interrupted the Senator. I do not believe that interruptions lead at all to a correct discussion of a question.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator will bear me out, however, in the statement that I was interrupted a great many times by his colleagues.

Mr. TURPIE. That may be; but if the Senator was interrupted he permitted it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will not interrupt the Senator. I will answer what he has to say later on, if I can.

Mr. TURPIE. That was my course.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And I think it is the proper course.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; I have no doubt the Senator can interrupt the Senators who interrupted him in discussing this question, but as I am to open the discussion it will be seen that it ought to be made as plain, as clear, and as consecutive as possible upon our side. I will read the section again:

> Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

I ask now, is there any limitation of time in this section, and to what does it apply? I think I can answer the question very clearly. There is a limitation of time. The limitation applies to the temporary exercise of the office of the governorship. It is said that it shall continue until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. Is there any limitation upon the time of the senatorship? Is there any limitation of time upon the speakership? Is there anything said about a limitation of time upon either of those offices, upon either of those positions? The constitution is entirely silent. The term of a speaker is unaffected by this section. The length of time for which he serves as speaker is unaffected by it. The term of Senator Watson is unaffected; it is unchanged. He remained speaker, he remained senator; there is no limitation either upon the power or upon the time as to the speaker or senator; there is no suspension of the power; there is no limitation of the time. The limitation of the time plainly expressed in the section is upon the temporary exercise of the governorship.

I do not think the mere silence of the constitution can authorize construction. What interpretation can there be; what explanation can there be; what construction can there be of the total silence of the constitution; its failure to make any limitation upon the term of the speakership or of the senatorship? There is no room for any explanation. There is nothing to explain; there is nothing to interpret; the interpretation of the claimant becomes interpolation.

Now, Mr. President, I ask again with reference to this construction. The constitution in its text in this section 14 does not provide that the speaker of the senate or the speaker of the house in either instance shall be or become governor of the State. Neither officer is anywhere called in this section the governor of the State. Let us look now at the different clauses:

> Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

He is there called the speaker of the senate who exercises the office; he is not called governor. He is distinguished in the most emphatic manner from governor, as I shall show in the future.

The next clause refers to the speaker of the house, and in that case the officer designated is called the speaker of the house of representatives exercising the office of governor.

The next clause provides that—

> If upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor there be no other person who can exercise said office within the provisions of the constitution the secretary of state shall exercise the same until the next meeting of the general assembly.

There is a solid sentence; no comma, no semicolon, no stop at all. The secretary of state shall exercise the office until the meeting of the general assembly. There is a plain limitation on the time he shall exercise the office. It is shorter than the other time; until the meeting of the general assembly. There is no limitation on how long he shall be secretary of state.

But I ask with reference to this single sentence in three lines, where the temporary power is conferred upon the secretary of state, how could the secretary of state exercise it unless he was secretary of state, and where is there the slightest intimation, the most intangible hint, that he does not continue to be secretary of state while he is in the temporary exercise of the executive authority? But he is not called the governor; he is called the secretary of state, who exercises the executive authority.

Again, there is another contingency:

> If upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor there be no other person who can exercise said office within the provisions of the constitution the secretary of state shall exercise the same until the next meeting of the general assembly, who shall immediately proceed to elect, by joint ballot of both houses, a person to exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

There is another person designated to exercise the office by a very high method in a very high manner, selected in the same manner as the members of this body, by a joint ballot of the general assembly. Is he governor? Is he called and designated governor? No, sir; he is called a person to exercise the office. That is all he is called. He is not even named by inference the governor. How easy it would have been to have said, "Who shall proceed to elect, by joint ballot of both houses, a person to exercise the office until his successor shall be elected by the people." That is interpolation. Until a governor shall be elected by the people is the language of the constitution. Is not this person who exercises the office a governor? No; he is not. He is not called such. He is not in the gubernatorial succession. He is not in the rank, order, and dignity of governor. He is a person who exercises the office of governor by virtue of the choice of the joint assembly of the State of Delaware.

Who, then, may be governor? The constitution is perfectly plain upon that subject:

> The supreme executive powers of the State shall be vested in a governor. The governor shall be chosen by the citizens of the State.

Is it possible, then, that a governor of Delaware should be any other person than one chosen by the citizens of the State? Certainly not; he can not be. No person can be governor of Delaware unless he be chosen by the citizens of the State. Can not the senate choose a governor? No, sir. Can the house of representatives choose a governor? No, sir. Can both houses choose the governor? No, sir. Both houses put together can only select "a person to exercise the office of governor."

Now, it may be said, and perhaps by anticipation it was said by my honorable and learned friend from Oregon, that these are refinements. They are refinements of a very classic and elevated character. They are not mine; they belong to the text of the constitution of the State of Delaware. Here are five clauses in section 14 relating to temporary dispositions of the executive authority. In each of these clauses the person so designated is not once called governor. For five times ex industria, with exceeding care, the framers of this constitution and the people who adopted it have avoided calling the temporary occupant of the chair governor. They have refused to recognize him as governor. They have declared that he should not be known or recognized as governor, and have taken most extraordinary pains to see that in the text of the law he is not known, recognized, or declared governor of the State.

I was very much surprised then by the statement of the learned Senator from Oregon with reference to what he claims to be a well-known maxim of common law, that the acceptance of one office, an incompatible office, vacates an office formerly held by the same man. I am not now questioning that law, though I might question some construction put upon it by the honorable Senator; I will not do that in passing, but the question I ask is, When did he accept the second office of governor? How could he accept it? A man may accept a thing that is offered to him. He may even accept or decline a thing that is offered to him. A person is elected by the citizens of Delaware governor of the State. That person can accept, that person can decline. Was Mr. Watson ever elected by the citizens of the State to the office of governor? No. The maxim of common law has nothing to do with the question in the case. There was indeed no second office and no acceptance of any second office.

But, Mr. President, I pass now to the case where it is claimed that the speaker of the house may under certain conditions become a governor, to show also the same contrast, that in the exercise of the office of governor he can not become a governor, and that he never does become a governor. Here is the next section:

> If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office.

The speaker of the house of representatives is a very high dignity. It belongs to a very high order, both in the law and in the history of the State. But the speaker of the house of representatives is not the governor; he is not called or declared to be the Governor. He is only a pis aller; he is only a makeshift, he is only a substitute for the governor, and he is only that substitute until a governor be elected by the people. The speaker of the senate is a substitute until a governor be elected by the people, and qualified. This person, who is chosen on joint ballot, is simply a substitute to whom the temporary exercise of executive authority is committed, and in direct contrast with him, distinguished from him, different from him in rank and in order, and especially in the method of his choice until a governor can be elected, the only way a governor can be made, until a governor can be chosen by the citizens of a State, the only way in which a governor can come into existence. This substitute exercises the executive office until there has been such an election by the people of a governor.

Mr. GRAY. The election can only come from the people?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir. Now I pass on to another section which we of the minority think bears a great deal upon this question. I am going to read the sections consecutively, both together, because in that way I think we can get a better interpretation, a more perfect interpretation, a closer interpretation. They are now separated in the text by reason of the collocation, but if they were both together they would read this way:

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers, and also each house whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor may choose a speaker pro tempore.

Those two sections belong together. They are to be interpreted together. It needed no additional provision to authorize the election of a speaker pro tempore, upon the construction of the claimant that the speaker already elected had ceased to be a senator when the exercise of executive authority had befallen him, because this very first clause of this section says "Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers."

It is contended on the other side that the speaker so chosen when the executive authority has devolved upon him ceases to be speaker and ceases to be senator. Then the first clause of the section is ample; all they have got to do is to choose another speaker. What was then and is the office of the second clause in section 5, "and also each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor may choose a speaker pro tempore?" That is an additional authority. That is a very necessary authority, because the speaker being absent and continuing speaker while he is absent, and being the one speaker of the house duly chosen, it not being possible that there could be two, it is provided in the constitution of Delaware that a speaker pro tempore shall be elected by either house whose speaker may be so engaged in the office of executive service pro tempore for the time during which such speaker may be absent. If the regular speaker elected were no longer a senator, he could not be a speaker. They could immediately elect under the first clause, "each house shall choose its speaker and other officers." It was because the speaker first chosen still remained speaker and still remained senator, and because there could not be two speakers, that authority became necessary to elect a speaker pro tempore, a speaker for the time during the absence of the speaker, like a President pro tempore of this body. The speaker pro tempore is a constitutional officer. It is named in the constitution of the State of Delaware. It is a permanent provision for a temporary occasion for any and all occasions when the speaker is not present.

My honorable friend from Oregon lays a great deal of stress upon the word "may;" may choose a speaker. He insists that it shall have an imperative construction; that it shall be construed to mean "must." Well, I do not think so. I think it means just exactly what it says, to give the discretion to the house or senate whether they shall elect a speaker pro tempore or not. There might be circumstances in which a permanent officer for this purpose would not be needed. For instance, the governor might die the day before they adjourned, three days before, or a very short time before they adjourned. Without any constitutional provision at all, without either of these provisions, the house or the senate of Delaware, as well as of every other State in the Union where free government obtains, would have the right to make a presiding officer for the day to call some one to the chair, to move him to the chair, and take the sense of the house upon it. This "may" is inserted here so that when circumstances are such that the legislature do not wish to make a permanent appointment of a speaker pro tempore on that occasion they may from day to day call in one of their number to the chair and so proceed in the brief and closing days of a session.

But why, I should like to ask my honorable friend from Oregon, should we discuss the "may" at all in this case? "May choose." Is there any room for discussion? There would be some room if it were all in the subjunctive, if it were all in contingency, all in posse, and nothing in esse. But what do the facts in the case show? They show that this whole discretion has disappeared. The condition is gone. The senate of Delaware traveled over from the condition of hypothesis into the province of actual fact. It is not what they might do, but what did they do? They did elect a speaker pro tempore. That is the solution of it. They did it because although they had a permanent speaker, he might be absent. They did it because the speaker might not return until the term for the exercise of the executive authority expired, or it would be inconvenient for him to return; and therefore, when he was present, by both the sections his right to preside is recognized, because you can not have two permanent speakers—his right to preside is recognized, because there has been one speaker and one speaker pro tempore. Whenever he is present, or might be present or might return, he is recognized as speaker, and continues to be recognized as the regular speaker by the fact, not that they might, but in this case that they did, choose a person to act as a temporary substitute in his absence.

There has been a good deal of discussion about two general propositions in the constitution—one, section 12 of Article II, and another, section 5 of Article III. One provides that no person holding an office under the State shall be a senator. No person holding any office under the State shall be a senator. I admit that the governor is an officer of the State, but I say that Watson never was governor and never could be governor. He may be sometime, but when he becomes governor it will be after he is chosen by the citizens of the State to that office, in the language of the constitution. He will never become governor before that time. He can not be governor before that time. No other power can choose him. No other constituency can elect him. The governor of Delaware is chosen by the people. Watson was holding no other office under the State then—none whatever. He is a senator, and continues to be a senator.

I admit that the governor is an officer, but, for sufficient reasons already given, it is plain that Watson never was governor, and could not be governor. The right devolved upon him only to exercise the office. That is the extent of his authority; but this right was not an office, it was simply a right; it was not an office; it was simply the exercise of an office; it was a right appurtenant, not to Watson, nor to any person; it was a right appurtenant to the speakership, to the senatorship. It was a right inherent in no person, appertaining not to Mr. Watson; but it was a right inhering in and pertaining to the speakership of the senate of Delaware, and to a member of the senate of Delaware, by consequence.

Then there is another provision, a second of these sections, which provides that no "person holding any office under the United States, or this State, shall exercise the office of governor." I wish to turn to that section.

Mr. GEORGE. It is section 5 of Article III.

Mr. TURPIE. It provides:

No member of Congress, nor person holding any office under the United State, or this State, shall exercise the office of governor.

That evidently refers to the case of the office of governor chosen by the citizens of the State. It is in the same section, on the same page, and follows directly afterwards; and it does not refer, and could not refer, to the temporary exercise of the office of governor. Here is room for an interpolation, a very small one, which would support the construction given by the other side.

"No member of Congress, nor person holding any office under the United States, or this State, shall exercise the office of governor, or shall have devolved upon him the exercise of such office."

Thus there would have been a plain conflict; but it has been the care of the framers of the constitution and of the people who adopted it to avoid a conflict. Neither of those sections, neither section 12 of Article II, nor section 5 of Article III, has any reference to the temporary provision contained in the constitution for the ad interim exercise of the executive authority. They both refer in the first instance to the full elective term of the governor, and in the next to the full elective term of the senator, and provide that these terms, these offices, shall not be held by the same person at the same time. That is the totality of the provision.

This constitution was made sixty years ago. If it were redrafted we should perhaps have more modern terms. These sections simply provide that the person named shall be ineligible to the office of governor by the people, and that the other person named shall be ineligible to the office of senator by the people. That is the whole meaning and extent and intendment of the two sections quoted by the honorable Senator upon the other side. They are in perfect harmony with the other provisions of the constitution. There is no possible conflict or collision between them. But if there were an apparent conflict what would be the consequence? It would be the duty of this Senate to reconcile the language of the constitution so that all these sections might stand together and have effect. That would be the duty of the Senate, not to seek a conflict nor to make one, not to nurse a collision, but to harmonize, as they may be harmonized, all these provisions in the constitution of the State of Delaware. That is the duty of a court even in the case of an ordinary contract. It is the first law with respect to the construction of contracts where there seems to be an ostensible or apparent contradiction between one provision of a contract and another, or others, the first duty of the court is to construe all the provisions so as to reconcile them and give effect to each. If that be the duty of a court in any instance with respect to a contract, it is much more our duty with respect to the constitution of a sovereign State, a State paper of the highest dignity and of the gravest character. I can not believe that there is any conflict between these sections. I know there is none under the construction of the minority of the committee, or in the actual usage of them by the people of Delaware.

I now come more seriously, perhaps I ought to say a little more at length, to consider the maxim quoted by my honorable friend with respect to the common law. At common law it was held that two offices, one incompatible with the other, could not be held by the same person at the same time; and the Senator goes on to say that Mr. Watson accepted the office of governor. Mr. Watson could not accept the office of governor, as I have already stated, because it was never tendered or offered to him. He only had devolved upon him the temporary right of exercising the executive authority. Did he accept that? Did he accept anything? Was there anything he could accept? Was there anything he could decline? Nothing. He was in this condition: He was in the exact condition of an heir of an intestate as to real property. The heir, upon whom the law at the death of an ancestor casts immediately the estate, the heir does not accept it; he can not decline it. His birth, his race, his lineage, and the law take and designate the heir. It is not a matter of his volition. It was not a matter of the volition of the speaker of the senate under the constitution of the State of Delaware. He does not accept the right to exercise the executive authority temporarily; he does not accept any office in doing that. The constitution devolves it upon him unconditionally, designates him as the person temporarily to exercise this right. He can not help himself; and he stands in the same relation that the heir does. Of course the heir may not enter upon his estate; he may use his discretion as to whether he will use or make use of what has fallen to him; but he can not refuse the heirship; he must take the estate; then he can dispose of it. What a person must take, can he accept? How can he accept it? What a person must take, how can he decline? What duties have befallen a person who is compelled by law and designated by the constitution of his own State to perform, he can not escape. He can not escape his constitutional inheritance of temporary power. He may indeed refuse to exercise it.

Mr. GRAY. It is attached to the speaker of the senate.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; attached to the speakership and appurtenant to the speakership. He is designated as speaker of the senate, as the object of this devolution, as the constitutional heir of this authority, as the delegated depositary of this authority, and whatever he may choose to do afterwards, he can do nothing less nor more than to accede to the devolution which has befallen him. There is no escape for him.

What then? What application has this common-law maxim which the honorable Senator has quoted? None at all. All the cases he cited are those of very ordinary occurrence. Here was a man high in the custom-house who was appointed as a judge of the exchequer court. Of course, the exchequer court deals in nothing else except the rates of customs and internal duties; but for a man to be a judge in that court and at the same time an executive officer under any of the laws is entirely incompatible. There is no devolution in any such case. The acceptance is voluntary. It is an act of the person, but devolution is an act of the law. Here were two distinct offices made by the British statute cited. In this case there is one office, a senator from Delaware made by the constitution of the State of Delaware, and one appointment, that of the speakership of the senate, made by the senate, and no other office, only the right temporarily to exercise an office, a right appurtenant to the office which he already held.

I may be perhaps indulged in making a few remarks here. This whole system of a temporary use of executive authority seems very strange to us; it did to me on first reading it, because most of the States now elect an officer, a lieutenant-governor, who, upon the death of the governor, succeeds to the governorship; but I wish to say that, as familiar as that thing is to us, it is not at all familiar to the people of the State of Delaware. This is a very old provision in the constitution of the State of Delaware, that the speaker of the senate or the speaker of the house, shall, on the death of the governor, succeed temporarily to the exercise of the office. It is contained in the present constitution, which is sixty years old; it is contained in the constitution preceding it, now seventy or eighty years old, and it is contained in the constitution of 1776. I name it in honor of the noble State of Delaware, that she made a constitution for the State in August, 1776, only a calendar month after the Declaration of Independence. She is a charter member of that grand lodge of liberty since established, and she certainly had the right to say not who should have the office of governor, but who should exercise the office in case the governor chosen by the people died. She has said it. It may not suit the Senator from Oregon; many of us might think we could draft a better constitution; many of us might think this is antique, this is old-fashioned. I love it more upon that account. I do not think the institutions of the people of the several States should be subjected to change, borne about by every wind of doctrine. Such as the provision was made in 1776 it remains to-day; and it has frequently received, not only legislative construction, but actual, positive construction, recognized by the legislature of the State, and concurred in and acquiesced in by all the citizens of the State of Delaware. Repeated has been that acquiescence.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Oregon took a great deal of time to tell us in respect to the anticipated horrors—is that too strong a word?—calamities which would befall the State of Delaware for having committed temporarily to a legislative officer the exercise of executive authority. He instanced the case of where he could remove judges, go into the senate and vote for the removal, and then appoint; he instanced another case of what seemed to be extreme harshness. It was that where the governor was impeached, he could go in and vote on the question of his impeachment. I wish to say in general to all this reasoning, that these subjects were all fully considered not only by the convention which framed the constitution of the State of Delaware, but also by the people who adopted it, and we have details of even more perfect consideration than that. John M. Clayton was a member of the convention which framed the constitution; and there is an extract from his speech in an argument made, too, on the side of this claimant, in which he goes on to say that he has great confidence in senators of the State of Delaware, but he wishes to warn the convention against transferring to any member of the legislature any portion of the executive authority for any time. It is a very grave warning, made in most serious language, and doubtless enforced by that great historic induction which Mr. John M. Clayton would draw upon such a subject, upon such a theme. The convention heard him; the people of Delaware heard him; they heard him as we have heard the honorable Senator from Oregon—carefully, gravely, earnestly—and they decided against him and against the theory and against the policy, and they held to the ancient system of delegating to the speaker of the senate the temporary exercise of executive authority.

Besides all this, I must say that, after all, the Commonwealth of Delaware has got along very well. We have never heard of any very serious calamities which befell her on account of this temporary disposition of executive authority. However monstrous it may look to the Senator from Oregon, or to anyone else, dealing in the ordinary language of constitutions to-day, it certainly has proven well for the people of Delaware. There never has arisen with respect to it any trouble in actual fact, and none in the construction which we have given to these sections of the constitution in argument.

The Senator also devotes a good deal of his time to a consideration of the matter of the inextinguishable incompatibility existing between the office of governor, as he calls it—I shall call it the exercise of that office—and the office of senator. The Senator has found a method of creating a governor of Delaware without election, and without his being chosen by the people. He states that there is a great incompatibility between the exercise of the executive authority and the exercise of the authority of a senator by this constitution, while the laws of all the several States are full of such incompatibilities. They are full of even greater incongruities. Take the instance, for example, of the Chief Justice of the United States serving to-day or at any other time. He has assigned to him a circuit, and goes out and holds court around the circuit, and decides a case one way—one case or several cases—the parties are not satisfied and prosecute an appeal. That appeal comes up here to the court in banc, all the judges sitting together. The Chief Justice is one of them. He has a right to sit there, and he has a right to sit in judgment upon his own determination, upon his own decision. He has the right to vote to affirm it if he wishes to, to argue, to debate the correctness of the decision. It it true this right is not often exercised. Usually we find in the reports, "Fuller, Chief Justice, absent," indicating that he has tried the case below and did not wish to take any part in the discussion or decision above. But that is simply a voluntary renunciation of his right. The right remains.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me right there the Delaware constitution provides that in cases of that kind the governor shall appoint a judge ad litem.

Mr. GRAY. Oh, no.

Mr. GEORGE. Where the judge is interested.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Where he is interested in the cause.

Mr. GRAY. Yes; where he is interested in the cause.

Mr. TURPIE. Where he has a pecuniary interest; not where he has given an opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I supposed that was what the Senator was referring to.

Mr. TURPIE. I did not say interested in the cause; I did not make any such proposition. I said here was a judge acting in the first instance, and then reacting in his own favor. It is an incompatibility; it is an incongruity; it is anomalous. The Senator from Oregon said it was against common law, against common reason. However that may be, it is provided for by the Constitution of the United States and by the statutes of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. And by the constitution of Delaware.

Mr. TURPIE. And by the constitution of Delaware.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. TURPIE. And by the constitution of Ohio it is also provided. There they have a court in banc, the judges of which hold circuit. I was at one of them last summer, and I was struck with the incompatibility, because we have no such thing in Indiana. It struck me, as it would the Senator from Oregon, as being radically incompatible that a judge should be allowed such a privilege, such a right; but the constitution of Ohio provided for it. One of the powers of the people, the sovereign people of the State of Delaware, or any other State, is to make an incompatible constitution if they wish. That is one of their express powers implied in their sovereignty. The legislature may, and frequently does, make laws in contravention of the common law—in direct contravention of it. Take, for example, the subject of testimony. When many of us here commenced to practice law no person having the slightest pecuniary interest in a case could testify in it. A whole day I have seen taken up with arguing the question of pecuniary interest, because depended upon the decision the question whether the witness was allowed to be sworn, and especially was no party in a suit allowed to testify. All those witnesses were excluded. They were excluded because the common law said that the position of a party to a suit and a witness in a suit were incompatible—wholly incompatible—just as the honorable Senator from Oregon says. A man ought not to be allowed to swear money into his own pocket; a man ought not to be allowed to swear away some liability which he had incurred; it was wrong that the law should tempt a man or place him in a position where he should be both a witness and a party interested—it was reprobate, wholly wrong—and yet now in a great majority of the States pecuniary interest is no disqualification; everybody is heard no matter how much he may be interested; the parties to suits themselves are heard; the defendant in a criminal case is heard, if he wishes to be heard, as a witness.

So that these provisions, incompatible by the common law, are entirely abrogated by the statute. If an ordinary statute can abrogate and erase incompatibility of this character, why may not the constitution of the State of Delaware be gifted with the same power and the same authority?

I do not admit that there was the slightest incompatibility between the office of senator and the office of speaker and the temporary exercise of the executive authority—not the slightest; granting to my honorable friend from Oregon, for the sake of argument, that there was any incompatibility, that is the very thing the State of Delaware might destroy, the very thing that the constitution of Delaware might abrogate. They have abrogated it; they have swept away this common-law incompatibility, and have said that they would make their own rules. It is not, therefore, any more a competent question; it is hardly a reasonable question, if the honorable Senator will allow me to use the remark, to ask in this case what offices are compatible at common law.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, he, of course, does not understand that in anything I have said, I have claimed for one moment that the men who framed the constitution of Delaware could not, if they so desired, have made the offices of governor and of legislator so that they could be exercised by the same person simultaneously. I have admitted from the start that they had the perfect right to do it, but what I have claimed, and what I do insist on, is that they did not do it, but, on the contrary, they, by the provisions of this constitution, expressly prohibited it. That is my position.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, that is your position on one limb of your case.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is my position on all limbs of it.

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir, it is not. You devoted not less than an hour to the consideration of compatibility and incompatibility of the executive office with that of senator.

Mr. GRAY. Inherent incompatibility.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, inherent incompatibility, quoting the incident of impeachment, quoting the removal of judges, quoting the instance of the approval of acts of the legislature, quoting the instance of being in the legislature and holding an executive office. All this was done for the purpose of urging upon your limb and branch of the argument that the Senate might conclude that there were two offices one incompatible with the other. Upon that other branch of the argument which you now state, I will meet you there. You convince me that, by any reasonable construction of the constitution of Delaware, Watson was ever governor, or could be governor, then there will be another question to argue in this case.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think he was governor.

Mr. TURPIE. The constitution says he was not. He was only a person to exercise the office. The constitution does not call him governor, or name him governor; does not even inferentially permit or allow him to be called governor. I know the Senator calls him governor; the Senator called him governor fifty or sixty times in the course of his address, but I suppose that was a mere matter of courtesy.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. So does the legislature of Delaware call him governor.

Mr. TURPIE. So they might. It is like the case of the distinguished Senator who sits on my left [Mr. HILL]. They call him governor. He was governor of the Empire State two terms, and he was for part of the time lieutenant-governor of the State. It is a common courtesy where a man has held a distinguished position, or is even not holding it, even long years after he has left it, and even a lieutenant-governor of a State is called "governor" who never has been governor, and probably never will be governor; and in my State they call a defeated candidate for governor "governor." [Laughter.] They call him that more than anything else. You can not make Watson a governor by calling him so.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. They have no governor in Delaware, then?

Mr. TURPIE. Of course not, and will not have until a governor is chosen by the people.

Allow me to ask the Senator, how does it come that we are discussing the question here of incompatibility, and especially the question about whether there is anything incompatible in the governor as claimed going into the senate and voting on his impeachment? The honorable Senator says this is a case of rancorous incompatibility; and he says that as if everybody acquiesced in the action of the governor as claimed which is imputed to him. My notion is this, sir, that at the common law nemo debet esse judex in sua causa. I think that is a wiser maxim than any one the Senator has quoted, much broader, more universal. No one can be a judge in his own cause. How, then, could the governor as claimed sit as a judge in his own cause and vote in his own cause? In my opinion, the legislature of the State of Delaware would correct that instantly with a rule if a rule were necessary. But how do we happen to be sitting in consideration of that question at all here? May we not take some comfort in the reflection that this question about the governor as claimed presiding in Delaware on the occasion of his own impeachment is a very remote one? At what day in the future shall we be called upon to consider or decide it? Can the learned Senator give a date, or an approximate day or date, when we shall take jurisdiction of this question for the purpose of determining it? Allow me to ask with respect to that question now in argument, How ought we to be enlightened by a long series of contingencies ending with a query de hoc? Allow me to state to the honorable Senator that the Government can not be administered upon conundrums of this kind, and neither the organization of the Senate nor its membership can be aided or assisted by this species of conundrums. Sufficient unto the day are the questions of to-day. The questions of to-morrow may be better dealt with when the morrow comes.

I was going on, sir, to remark about the competency of an ordinary statute, and more especially of the constitution of a State, to abrogate incompatibility at common law. There is another instance well known. At common law husband and wife were one, and that one was the husband. All she had, all she earned, even the sweat at the washtub of the laboring woman was taken and applied in payment of the debts of the husband. That was the doctrine of the common law. Now, by constitution and partly by statute in our State, and I think in almost every other State in the Union, this incompatibility existing formerly in the married state is destroyed, and it is expressly provided in contravention of the common law and in contradiction to common law, in denial of common law, that what is the wife's is the wife's; that she owns it separate and apart from her husband; that it is not liable in any manner for the payment of his debts. That is an entire contradiction of the common law, made by statute and constitution. In the same manner, in the constitution of Delaware, the makers and the adopters of it had the power to do away with incompatibility if official incompatibility occurred in the provisions which they made in this instance.

I might call attention to a very severe case of this kind with respect to the United States officer just mentioned, the Chief Justice of the United States, who becomes the presiding officer in the Senate in the case of an impeachment. The language is the same as in the Delaware constitution. The operative verb is in the same mood and tense. The Constitution of the United States provides that in such cases the Chief Justice of the United States "shall preside" in the Senate. He does not take it in that case. It takes him. The constitution of the State of Delaware provides that on the death of the governor the speaker of the senate "shall exercise" the office. This right to exercise the office is not taken by the speaker. It is attached to the speakership. It is not accepted; it is not received. It is thrown upon the speakership.

So I say with respect to the presidency of the Chief Justice of the United States in case of impeachment. He is required to preside here. When he does preside he is the same as any other President of the Senate. He decides all questions, parliamentary questions, questions of law; he performs all the functions of a presiding officer in the Senate. Does he thereby vacate his seat in the Supreme Court of the United States? Is he suspended from any function as Chief Justice of the United States, or is it simply the fact that the presidency during impeachment is attached to the office of Chief Justice? Is it not the case in the other instance that the exercise of the executive authority is attached to the speakership? It is not taken, not seized; but it is involuntarily cast in one case upon the Chief Justice, and in the other case upon the speaker of the senate.

But, Mr. President, I spoke of a practical construction which had been given to these clauses of the constitution in the history of the State of Delaware. This construction is practical; it is contemporaneous, very near the time when the constitution was framed and adopted, and it is continuous, unbroken. There has been no breach under its practice. There are at least four persons now noted here in argument—conceded in argument—who as speakers of the senate have succeeded temporarily to the exercise of executive authority.

Mr. GRAY. Five.

Mr. TURPIE. Five; excuse me. Mr. Cooley, that very distinguished author, says that this kind of construction, practical construction, when near or approximating the time of the constitution, and when the precedents in respect to it are unbroken, overrides every other consideration. No court will set it aside. No tribunal will reject it. The whole profession acquiesces in that practice, recognized by the people, acquiesced in and acknowledged by the people of a State when they are in the business of transacting their public affairs. Of these five persons who have hitherto exercised temporarily the executive authority under the section of the constitution just read, Mr. Polk is one, and I name him especially because he is one to whom the exercise of the executive authority came, upon whom it devolved during the lifetime of the present constitution, which was adopted in 1830. He was speaker of the senate, and had devolved upon him the exercise of the executive office in 1834. He served until a governor was elected by the people, filling exactly the language of the constitution, and when a governor had been elected by the people and qualified, Mr. Polk went to the senate of the State, whence he had been temporarily absent, and served out his time in the senate.

Every one of the persons who has served either as speaker of the senate or as speaker of the house, without a single exception, after the expiry of the time limited for the temporary exercise of executive authority, went into the senate and completed his term as senator without protest, without objection.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator from Indiana will pardon me, unless I misunderstand him he is certainly wrong in his facts. I understand the Senator to say that in every case where a speaker of the senate has succeeded to the exercise of the office of governor, that after he has gotten through with the governorship he has gone back and finished out his term as senator. Is that the statement?

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then I misunderstood the statement.

Mr. TURPIE. I said in five cases there was such a condition of affairs. Of course there were some cases in which the senatorship had expired.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes.

Mr. TURPIE. There were some cases in which the senatorship and the speakership ceased.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There are at least five or six cases where the senatorship expired before the parties could cease to exercise the office of governor.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes. I had on my notes four cases, but the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] corrected me and said there were five persons who served temporarily in the exercise of executive authority, not as governor. They were not authorized to serve as governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There were four——

Mr. TURPIE. They were not authorized to serve as governor by anything in the constitution. That authority comes only from the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. It has no authority in the State of Delaware.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. To what authority does the Senator refer?

Mr. TURPIE. There are five senators who temporarily exercised executive authority, who went into the senate after they had so exercised it and served out their terms as senators without protest and without objection. Mr. Polk, the person I named, was a very prominent gentleman in Delaware at that time. He was president of the convention that framed the present constitution in 1830. Did he not know what it meant? Did he not have an understanding about its meaning?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Not one of them ever——

Mr. TURPIE. Did he not understand in reading those sections that the speaker of the senate, notwithstanding the temporary exercise of the executive office, remained speaker of the senate and remained a senator? He must have understood it. There is contemporaneous authority. There is a practical construction, made by one of the makers of the constitution of Delaware, of the two sections to which I have called the attention of the Senate, and that practical construction, as I said before, is without any breach in precedent. Some persons designated speakers of the senate took the same course and went into the senate afterwards and served out the remainder of their senatorial terms.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. But not one of them ever undertook to exercise both offices at once.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Not one of them.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Except Watson.

Mr. TURPIE. All of them. All of them retained the exercise of the functions of both offices at once.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Never.

Mr. TURPIE. Every one of them.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Never in a single instance.

Mr. TURPIE. In every instance they retained the exercise of the functions of both offices at once. If not, how could they afterwards go into the senate without a reelection?

Now, the Senator says that for one hundred and four years this precedent has been unbroken. He mentions this to show the strength of refraining. He says all these people refrained, and he says that for one hundred and four years this one refrained, that one refrained, they all refrained.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the person in the exercise of this office remains a senator; and I am glad that we have precedents running through such a long time. It shows that the person so remains; that his seat is not subject to occupation by another; that it is not vacant; that the devolution of the right, not being itself an office, does not disqualify him; that there is no suspension or abeyance or interim of his term as senator except as occasioned by his voluntary absence and action. That is all shown by the history of the State of Delaware for one hundred and four years, as the learned Senator well says.

I know it is said that these gentlemen refrained, and I am very glad the Senator used the word "refrain." I understand the word "refrain" to be indicative of the action where a man or a woman having a right to do a thing and an opportunity to do it, forbears to do it, voluntarily foregoes doing it. How, then, can it be said in any sense——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. A man may refrain from doing a thing he has no right to do.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes; he may, but the position of the honorable Senator is that he is compelled, prohibited, forbidden from exercising the speakership because he has the exercise for a time of the office of governor; that he is forbidden to be a senator and to exercise the executive office; that he is prohibited from exercising the executive office at the same time continuing to be a senator. But when he comes to speak of the precedent, when he comes to speak of the actual construction, when he comes to speak of the interpretation put upon this provision by Mr. Polk, the maker of it, then he says "this gentleman refrained and Mr. Watson had better have refrained." That is the force of his position. It would have been better for Mr. Watson if he had refrained.

I am very glad the Senator used the word, because it is plain that in the view of the senator himself Watson had a perfect, right, a perfect opportunity, and was in full exercise of the functions of the executive office while he was senator. I will repeat, what I repeated to the Senator, he was in full possession of the functions of the speakership, competent to discharge them, but he voluntarily forbore to exercise them. He voluntarily refrained from exercising them. That is the meaning of "refraining" according to the English language and according to the most approved dictionaries. I should dislike very much to have it said in the old fable that the fox refrained from eating the grapes, very sour, beyond his reach. That is not a case of refraining. But that is the case of the Senator from Oregon, according to his construction. He says that Mr. Watson refrained. That is true. That is exactly what he did do. He forbore. That is exactly what he did do. While he might have exercised it and when he might have exercised it he declined to enter the senate and to take part in the legislative business. But the other limb of the honorable Senator's conclusion is that he was forbidden to do it. If he was forbidden, if he was prohibited, if it was unlawful, if it was unconstitutional, why talk about refraining?

It appears, then, from the Senator's own statement and account of this historical precedent that Mr. Watson had a perfect right both in law and morals to be in, to vote, and to preside in the senate. His right to do so was recognized and acknowledged by his peers, by his brother senators, by both houses of the legislature, and by an unbroken stretch of precedents for one hundred and four years. That, I think, is practical construction of the highest character. I do not see how construction could be more practical; how it could be more contemporaneous.

Mr. PEFFER. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me for a moment? It will assist me very much in arriving at a conclusion if he will answer a question. Under our law, in case of the death or other disability of the President of the United States the Secretary of State first and afterwards certain other officers are authorized and required to exercise the office of President. In that case would the officer so succeeding keep the office that he now holds?

Mr. TURPIE. I think he would.

Mr. GRAY. Unless the statute provides it.

Mr. TURPIE. Unless there is a law against it; but the Presidential function may be temporarily added to it. The Presidential functions were formally added by law to the President of the Senate. The old law provided for that succession; that the President of this body should, on the death or inability of the President of the United States and the Vice-President of the United States, succeed to the Presidency, and there was actually one President pro tempore of the Senate who served one day as President of the United States, David R. Atchison, of Missouri. But did he vacate his Senatorship?

Mr. PEFFER. He did not vacate his office.

Mr. TURPIE. No; this right temporarily to exercise the office of President or of Vice-President, or any other office except the one which the party holds, is only a right; it is not another office; nor a second office. It is nothing which he can acquire. It is something that he is obliged to take, compelled to take.

Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to conclude my remarks to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 10, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 9, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HENDRICK to fill a vacancy on the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this being the day set apart under the rules for the consideration of District of Columbia business, I desire, if it be now in order, to call up——

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a few minutes? I wish to present a couple of privileged reports from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BABCOCK. Very well.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR SENATE AND HOUSE LIBRARIES.

Mr. PERKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back with an amendment to the title Senate joint resolution No. 72.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 72) directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Whereas the number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD provided for the Senate library by section 73 of the act in regard to public printing, approved January 12, 1895, has proved insufficient to supply the needs of the Senate: Therefore,

Resolved, etc., That section 73 of the act of January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents, which reads: "To the Senate and House libraries, 10 copies each," be so amended as to read: "To the Senate and House libraries, 20 copies each.

The report of the committee was as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration Senate joint resolution directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 10 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, report the same back with the recommendation that it be agreed to, the title to be amended in the second line by striking out the word "twenty" and inserting "ten."

It is represented to your committee that the 10 copies authorized to each library by the act of January 12, 1895, have proved insufficient to answer the demands of Senators and Representatives upon the respective libraries.

The cost is estimated at $500 per each Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof, the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the Committee on Printing, to strike out in the title the word "twenty" and insert "ten," it was agreed to.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 789) for the relief of Kate Winter—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. 690) for the relief of Fanny B. Randolph and Dora L. Stark—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 93) to permit Anne M. Colman, a widow, to prosecute a claim—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 290) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in the cases of Edward N. Fish and others for supplies furnished the Indian service—to the Committee on Claims.

BULLETIN ON APICULTURE.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 copies of the work on apiculture compiled by the Department of Agriculture; the same to be in paper covers, 10,000 copies of which shall be for the House of Representatives and 5,000 for the Senate.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the committee offers an amendment to the resolution, which is set forth in the report. I will ask for the reading of the amendment. There is no necessity for the reading of the entire report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "fifteen thousand" and insert "twenty thousand," and strike out the word "and" after the word "Representatives," and add at the end of the resolution the words "and five thousand copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture."

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Printing was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

The title of the resolution was amended to conform to the increase in the number of copies.

MUSTER ROLLS, THIRD AND FOURTH KANSAS INFANTRY.

Mr. BLUE. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield to me for a moment, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House joint resolution No. 99. This is a House resolution with reference to furnishing copies of the rolls of Lane's Brigade of Kansas Infantry Volunteers.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution to supply the State of Kansas with copies of the muster rolls of the Third and Fourth Regiments of Kansas Infantry.

Whereas the Third and Fourth Regiments of Kansas Infantry, composing what was known as Lane's Brigade, were by independent action of the War Department consolidated into the Tenth Kansas Infantry; and

Whereas the State of Kansas has no record of this action and no rolls of said regiments; and

Whereas all records of said regiments and said action of the War Department consolidating the same are in the archives of the War Department at Washington, D. C.: Therefore,

Be it resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to the State of Kansas copies of the muster rolls of the Third and Fourth Kansas Infantry and copies of the records pertaining to their consolidation into the Tenth Kansas Infantry; and the sum of $150, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to enable the Secretary of War to provide said copies and carry out the provisions of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. DINGLEY. Before consent is given, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas as to the necessity of the appropriation embodied in this resolution. This work, if authorized to be done at all, will be performed by the clerks in the Department, and I do not see why there should be a special appropriation made for the purpose.

Mr. BLUE. I will answer the gentleman by stating that the letter appended to the report accompanying the resolution, from Colonel Ainsworth, shows the necessity for this work. This is a special report, and Colonel Ainsworth states that the cost will be about $142. It can not be done by the regular force.

The gentleman from Maine will understand that this particular brigade was known as Lane's Brigade, and was enlisted independent of the regular call on the State for troops by Colonel Lane and President Lincoln. The two regiments composing the brigade were the Third and Fourth Kansas Infantry——

Mr. DINGLEY. I know; but as I understand it, the transcript can be furnished by the regular clerks of the War Department.

Mr. BLUE. No; this is an exception to the ordinary cases; and Colonel Ainsworth says that an appropriation will be necessary to pay the expense.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to inquire if the facts in this case are exceptional, so that we will not have a precedent established for making appropriations of this character hereafter, when such information is required.

Mr. BLUE. The facts, I am informed, are entirely exceptional.

In the early days of the conflict, Senator Lane and President Lincoln, without any State interference and without the State of Kansas participating at all, organized what was known as Lane's Brigade. The two regiments composing the brigade were afterwards consolidated into the Tenth Kansas Infantry. There is no record in the Adjutant-General's Office of the rolls of this command, and this is simply to obtain a copy from the Record and Pension Division of the War Department. I made application to the Department for the transcript, and was informed that under the general law it could not be furnished.

This resolution carries an appropriation of $150 to meet the expense; so much to be used as shall be necessary.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has this matter been submitted to the Secretary of War?

Mr. BLUE. No; it has been submitted to Colonel Ainsworth, as his letter accompanying the report shows.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think, in all cases of this kind, Mr. Speaker, that such requests (and I say it with all due respect to the gentleman) should be submitted to the Secretary of War or head of the Department. While I have the greatest confidence in the officer the gentleman speaks of, still the proper thing to do is to go to the Secretary, the head of the Department, for such information. He has charge of these matters.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will permit me, before objection is made, I would like to say——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object?

Mr. McMILLIN. I was endeavoring to find out, Mr. Speaker, the status of this question before interposing an objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand the gentleman from Kansas, he says that this bill has been submitted to and received the approval of Colonel Ainsworth?

Mr. BLUE. It has.

Mr. McMILLIN. The suggestion I was making was that matters of this kind should always be referred to the head of the Department.

Mr. DOCKERY. But this has already been referred to the Chief of the Record and Pension Office, who has charge of these files.

Mr. McMILLIN. Of course; but when you come to make an application, for instance, to the Commissioner of Pensions for information, that application should go through the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DOCKERY. This officer is an exceedingly efficient one.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have already admitted that he is, and have no objection to make on that account. But I think the proper course in all of these cases should be to call upon the Department head—the official having charge of the rolls in the first instance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being upon the passage,

Mr. BLUE said: Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that the report of the committee had better be printed in connection with this resolution, and I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. HULL) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs have considered the resolution (H. Res. 99) to furnish the State of Kansas copies of muster rolls of the Third and Fourth Regiments of Kansas Infantry, and recommend that it do pass.

These regiments were consolidated into the Tenth Kansas Infantry by the War Department independent of the State of Kansas. Kansas has no record of either the Third or Fourth Regiment. They were known as Lane's Brigade, and were enlisted independent of regular calls on the State for troops, and the only record of such enlistment is in the War Department.

The adjutant-general of Kansas writes:

"I have had correspondence with the Secretary of War relating to these records, and Col. F. C. Ainsworth, Chief of the Record and Pension Office, informs me that it will cost the State about $142 to have copies of these records made. We have no appropriation to pay this expense. Could you not, by resolution or otherwise, require these records to be furnished the State gratis. You will understand that this consolidation was made by the arbitrary action of the War Department, and the records should have been furnished the State at the time. The organization of Lane's Brigade was, I believe, under direct authority of the War Department, given Senator J. H. Lane to raise and command a brigade, and the returns must have been made direct to Washington, as neither muster-in rolls or anything else was ever in possession of this office. Please take this matter in charge.

"The following is the indorsement on my application for duplicate of the muster-in rolls, dated June 28, 1895:

"RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
"War Department, Washington, D. C., July 6, 1895.

"Respectfully returned to the adjutant-general of Kansas, State of Kansas, Topeka, Kans.

"Copies of the muster rolls of the Third and Fourth Kansas Infantry, referred to within, can be furnished to the governor of the State of Kansas, upon application therefor, under provisions of War Department orders of April 4, 1895, a copy of which is herewith inclosed.

"The cost of making the copies in question will probably be $142.

"By authority of the Secretary of War.

"F. C. AINSWORTH,
"Colonel, United States Army, Chief of Office.

"I am unable to give further information. You no doubt have some recollection of the matter yourself.

"Very respectfully, S. M. FOX, Adjutant-General."

The joint resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. BLUE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SALE OF PRINTED COPIES OF PATENTS.

Mr. DRAPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6195) amending the statutes relating to the sale of printed copies of patents.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 493 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same hereby is, amended by striking out the words "within the limits of 10 cents as the minimum and 50 cents as the maximum price," in lines 3 and 4, and substituting in lieu thereof "Provided, That the maximum cost of a copy shall be 10 cents"; so that the section so amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 493. The price to be paid for uncertified printed copies of specifications and drawings of patents shall be determined by the Commissioner of Patents: Provided, That the maximum cost of a copy shall be 10 cents."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read, Mr. Speaker.

The report (by Mr. DRAPER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred House bill 6195, have had the same under consideration and report as follows:

The Commissioner of Patents states that there is required by the needs of the Patent Office and of the public to be printed at least 102 copies of every patent, and that this is the case whether any of them are sold or not. There is a large accumulation of these copies, from which sales are made every day. Last year there were sold 608,392 copies, producing an income of about $60,000.

If this measure passes the price will be fixed by rule of the Commissioner, under the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and the judgment of the committee is that the price might properly be 3 cents each for copies of patents if ordered by classes or subclasses; that is, if ordered in classified sets of perhaps 100.

The effect of this would be, in the Commissioner's judgment, to take out of the office a considerable amount of material which might better be in the hands of the public; that useful information would thereby be disseminated as to the industrial arts; the convenience of inventors and attorneys much promoted, and finally the receipts of the Government from this source considerably increased. The needs of the attorneys are such that at the moderate cost of 3 cents whole subclasses would probably be ordered in many cases where but single copies are now ordered.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand this has the approval of the Commissioner of Patents?

Mr. DRAPER. It has, and is unanimously reported by the Committee on Patents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DRAPER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

S. W. PEEL.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2684) for the relief of S. W. Peel, for services rendered the Old Settlers Cherokees.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay S. W. Peel $5,000, out of the unexpended balance of the 35 per cent of the amount due the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians of the Indian Territory, said 35 per cent being heretofore set aside by said Cherokee Indians to defray the expense incurred in and about the prosecution and collection of their claim against the United States; this amount to be paid Peel in full for professional services rendered said Indians in defending the contested claims of various attorneys against the fund of said Indians known as the 35 per cent, which contest was before the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the honorable Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before consent is given, I should like to hear some statement about this bill. It seems to be a proposition to pay $5,000 to some attorney.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. DOOLITTLE], who reported the bill, can, I think, make an explanation which will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported favorably and unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs, after an investigation of all the facts. The amount was provided for under contract with these Indians, and there is no doubt about the character or value of the services. They were for the preservation of the Cherokee moneys. There is no doubt about the propriety of the passage of the bill. The report states all the facts.

Mr. McRAE. I will state in addition to what the gentleman from Washington has said that the House has already passed a bill identical in terms, except, perhaps, as to the amount, for other attorneys who represented the Indians in this matter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes; the Van Voorhis and Jones bill was identical with this in character. This meets with the approval of everybody concerned.

Mr. DINSMORE. I wish to state that all the parties are agreed that the money is due.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McRAE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HARBOR AT CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 133.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to report to Congress, as soon as possible, what repairs are necessary to be made to the piers and breakwater in the harbor at Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, to preserve the same, and what would be the cost of making such necessary repairs; and also to report what changes, if any, should be made in the location of said piers, and what would be the cost of the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—ALDRICH VS. ROBBINS.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, we should like to have some understanding as to the time when the case of Aldrich vs. Robbins shall be considered. A minority report has been filed, and I suggest that on Wednesday, as early as practicable after the meeting of the House, this case be taken up for debate.

Mr. DINSMORE. I should like to say to the chairman of the committee that our colleague [Mr. TURNER of Virginia] is ill and confined to his bed at this time, and it would be appreciated as a courtesy if the matter might be laid over for a day or two, until he can be present.

Mr. DANIELS. In reference to that, Mr. Speaker, the members of our committee have all examined this case very thoroughly, and they desire to be heard. Certainly three hours and a half would be consumed on the part of the majority of the committee in the discussion, and that will carry the matter over until Thursday, when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TURNER] can be present, no doubt. I should think that would be sufficient to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas. That will give the gentleman from Virginia an opportunity to discuss the matter on Thursday.

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not insist upon the delay as a matter of right at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York gives notice that he purposes to call it up at that time.

Mr. DANIELS. I anticipate calling it up as early as the case may be taken up after the session commences on Wednesday.

Mr. DINGLEY. You give notice that you will call it up then?

Mr. DANIELS. That it will be brought up at that time.

CHRISTOPHER SCHMIDT.

Mr. KIEFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 521) for the relief of Christopher Schmidt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40 a month to Christopher Schmidt, of St. Paul, Minn., for injuries received from accidental shot on the rifle range at Fort Snelling, July 14, 1892, in quarterly payments, upon such vouchers as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the report on that bill read.

Mr. KIEFER. This bill passed the Senate twice, in the Fifty-third Congress and the last time some ten days ago, and has passed the House Committee on Claims twice unanimously; and I now ask the Clerk to read the report.

The report (by Mr. HEINER of Pennsylvania) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 521) for the relief of Christopher Schmidt, have carefully considered the same and report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BLUE. I want to ask a question about that bill.

Mr. CRISP. That report does not throw much light upon the bill.

Mr. KIEFER. I have a report here, if the gentleman will permit it to be read, from the colonel commanding at Fort Snelling, and also the report of the post surgeon at the fort. I will ask that that be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, without objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORT SNELLING, MINN., October 28, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a report by the post surgeon on the nature of the wound received by one Christopher Schmidt, a civilian, on the target range at this post last summer, together with the subsequent history of the case.

The circumstances of this occurrence and the subsequent proceedings are as follows:

The target range at this post is located so that the line of fire is crossed by two roads—the Bloomington road crossing the range diagonally in front of the targets and the Richfield road passing in a direction perpendicular to the line of fire in rear of targets. These two roads join at a point about 200 yards from the range. At this point a flagstaff was erected, with a high platform, on which a man was stationed with instructions that when any person or vehicle approaching on either road was not less than 100 yards from the range the flag was to be lowered and all firing must then cease.

These instructions were written out and posted in a conspicuous place at the lookout station. On the 14th of July Private Eugene T. Fay, Company D, Third Infantry, was detailed for duty at the lookout station, and, in addition to the written instructions, received verbal instructions, before being posted, to be particularly careful to keep a sharp lookout on the Richfield road. At about 11 o'clock on the morning in question Christopher Schmidt passed the lookout station on foot and walked along the Richfield road, in full view from the lookout station. When nearly across the range he was struck by a rifle bullet and wounded as described in the report of the post surgeon. As soon as the fact was reported, a board of officers was convened to investigate the matter. This board, after a thorough investigation, reported that in their opinion the accident was due to the gross neglect of Private Fay in failing to lower the flag, as directed in his instructions. Private Fay was placed in confinement and brought to trial before a general court-martial. He was acquitted by the court, but the finding was disapproved by the department commander.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWIN C. MASON,
Colonel Third Infantry, Commanding Post.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL DEPARTMENT OF DAKOTA.

FORT SNELLING, October 25, 1892.

SIR: A civilian, Christopher Schmidt, German, aged 32 years, was accidentally shot on the rifle range at Fort Snelling, July 14, 1892.

He was passing the line of fire with his head bent forward; the ball, apparently en ricochet, entered about the center of the left supraorbital arch, implicating the foramen, lacerated the eyeball, passed diagonally inward and downward, grazed the right tonsil and lodged on the right side of the neck beneath the great vessels, slightly behind the sternocleidoastoid muscle in the superior triangle.

When admitted to the hospital he was in a condition of intense shock; between the time of admission and 10 p. m. vomited blood in considerable quantities, accompanied with nasal hemorrhage, mostly from the left nostril. The wound was antiseptically dressed. His general condition being fairly satisfactory, the wound was not re-dressed until July 19.

As the left eye was irretrievably injured, the propriety of its removal before any symptoms of sympathetic inflammation occurred in the other eye had been most evident from the first. As the case was an important one not only in itself, but also on account of a probable suit against the United States for damages, the opinion of an expert oculist was deemed advisable by myself. Dr. McDavitt, of St. Paul, saw the case with me, coincided in the treatment which had been pursued, and recommended immediate enucleation. I had proposed operating myself, but, in consideration of the courtesy of Dr. McDavitt, the operation was offered to and accepted by him.

The patient convalesced without an unfavorable symptom, but being poor was retained in the hospital until October 18, when he was discharged. In addition to the loss of his eye, he has, owing to the injuries of certain nerves, entirely lost the sense of smell on both sides; he has ptosis or inability to raise the left eyelid, together with partial paralysis of the forehead and neuralgia of left forehead. As the ball is apparently encysted, no operation for its removal is considered advisable at the present time.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. K. WINNE,
Surgeon, United States Army.

The POST ADJUTANT,
Fort Snelling, Minn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, one moment before that is given. I understand this is a proposition to pension at the rate of $40 per month a civilian who came within range of rifle practice. Is that what it is?

Mr. KIEFER. Yes, sir; I will explain in just one minute.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there any allegation that there was carelessness on the part of those engaged in the target practice?

Mr. KIEFER. Absolute proof of that fact. The danger flag that was usually stationed at this position at Fort Snelling when target shooting was practiced was not at that time hauled up. The man who was injured knew nothing about it, and while walking upon the public highway, where he had a perfect right to walk, he was shot; one eye was taken out, his hearing was destroyed, and his sense of smell destroyed; and here is a photograph of that poor man as he lies on his back as the result of his injury. The bill has passed the Senate, and has twice been passed by the Committee on Claims of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it fully established that it was in consequence of carelessness on the part of those who had charge of the rifle practice?

Mr. KIEFER. Absolutely.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there any report from the War Department?

Mr. KIEFER. There is in that report which I have had read. The colonel commanding the fort at the time has made a statement and so has the post surgeon. In fact, the authorities there have made such statements that no more could be asked to establish the fact that the man was absolutely innocent so far as he was concerned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLUE. Since I have heard this statement, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this precedent ought to be established; and until I can get some further light than has yet been offered, I shall have to object.

TERMS OF COURTS IN NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 270) to detach certain counties from the judicial districts of California, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act of August 5, 1886, chapter 928, relating to the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the northern district of California, to be held at San Francisco, be amended so as to provide that the holding of terms of said circuit and district courts shall be as follows: Beginning on the first Monday in March, the second Monday in July, and the first Monday in November in each year; and so much of such section 3 as is inconsistent with this provision is hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I move that the title be amended in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend title so as to read: "A bill changing the time of holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of California."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be considered as amended.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

On motion of Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONVENTION OF PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF DIOCESE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 6407.

Mr. ODELL. I desire to substitute for the House bill the bill S. 1825.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 1825 for the House bill 6407.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the bills are identical in terms.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is the same bill as passed the Senate.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has the bill been read?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the House bill and then the Senate bill which is proposed to be substituted.

The bill H. R. 6407 was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6407) to incorporate the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington.

Whereas it hath been represented to the Congress of the United States by a committee appointed by the primary convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the diocese of Washington, whereof the Reverend John H. Elliott, D. D., was president, and the Reverend Arthur S. Johns was secretary, convened in the city of Washington on the 4th day December, A. D. 1895, which diocese comprises the District of Columbia, together with the counties of Montgomery, Prince George, Charles, and St. Mary, in the State of Maryland, and the convention whereof is composed of clergymen of said church canonically resident within said diocese, and entitled to seats in said convention, and laymen duly chosen to represent the parishes and congregations in said diocese; and as such committee, charged with the duty and authority for and on behalf of said convention and diocese to present and procure the passage by Congress of an act incorporating the said convention with provisions and powers suitable and proper to the religious, missionary, charitable, and educational objects of the church and the organizations aforesaid; and

Whereas it is further represented that members of the church aforesaid have subscribed for and have raised funds especially for the permanent support of the episcopate of said church in said diocese, as well as to defray the necessary expenses of the said convention from year to year, and to carry on religious, missionary, charitable, and educational work in said diocese, and to aid in the support of its disabled, aged, or superannuated clergy, but that the convention of said church in said diocese, though intrusted and charged with the administration of its affairs, has no legal capacity to receive, invest, manage, or dispose of said fund or any proceeds or property resultant therefrom; and

Whereas it is also represented that the convention of the diocese of Maryland has resolved to transfer to said diocese of Washington its agreed portion of the funds of the former so soon as said new diocese has legal capacity to receive the same: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the aforesaid Rev. John H. Elliott, D. D., and Rev. Arthur S. Johns, and their associate members of said primary convention, and their successors who may hereafter constitute the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington be declared, and they hereby are, incorporated and made a body corporate and politic, by the name and style of "The Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington," and by that name they, and their successors hereafter to be elected, appointed, made, and qualified, according to the form and effect of the constitution of the said church for the time being, shall have perpetual succession, and by such name be capable of suing and being sued in any court of law or equity, and shall have and use a common or corporate seal, and the same break, alter, and renew at pleasure, and shall have and exercise all such other powers as shall or may be necessary or proper to carry into effect the objects of such incorporation.

SEC. 2. That the said corporation shall have full power and authority to take and hold subscriptions, contributions, donations, grants, devises, or bequests, in money or otherwise, for the purpose of creating a permanent fund or endowment for the support of the episcopate in said diocese, which heretofore have been made, or which may be made for such purposes, or to, or in behalf of the various associations and societies for religious, missionary, charitable, or educational purposes now existing or hereafter to exist under the jurisdiction, control, or sanction of said convention within the limits of said diocese, and the same to invest and the proceeds thereof to apply for the purposes aforesaid as may from time to time be deemed most expedient; and to appoint in its discretion an executive committee, or other trustees, boards, or agencies, by whatever name or names they may be designated, to administer such funds or property in such manner and form and with such authority as the said corporation shall from time to time prescribe: Provided, however and always, That in such administration the respective funds shall be kept distinct and separate; that each fund shall be held liable only for obligations that may have been incurred in its own proper behoof; and that the principal sum or amount of subscriptions, contributions, donations, grants, devises, and bequests for permanent endowment of the episcopate shall be at all times invested in some safe and profitable stocks, mortgages, deeds of trust, or other securities; and the expenses of administering the same, the salary of the bishop, and other charges shall be payable and paid only out of the annual interest, dividends, or profits thereof.

SEC. 3. That the convention of said diocese may by resolution thereof adopt such rules and regulations in regard to such funds and their administration, and the same thereafter alter, amend, or abrogate, as to the said convention may seem expedient.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall enlarge, restrict, or in any manner affect the power or authority which said convention now hath, or may exercise or claim over said church in said diocese, or the members thereof, but all such powers and authorities which are or may be claimed or exercised shall remain in like condition, and none other, as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 5. That unless this act shall be accepted by resolution of the convention of said diocese at its next annual meeting and a copy of such resolution of acceptance, certified by the secretary of the convention, be filed for record with the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia within sixty days thereafter, the same shall thereupon be void and of no effect.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Senate bill 1825 be dispensed with, as it is exactly the same as the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there is some difference between the two bills.

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no difference in the effect of the bills. The provisions of the bills are the same, and the Senate bill has been considered by the House committee since its report was made on the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Senate bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman a question. Will the property held by the proposed corporation be subject to taxation under the District laws?

Mr. ODELL. I think not.

Mr. CANNON. You think not?

Mr. ODELL. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman think that wise?

Mr. ODELL. This is a religious corporation, and this bill does nothing more nor less than divide up the property which now is controlled by the Diocese of Maryland.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that this is a religious corporation and that its property would be exempt from taxation.

Mr. ODELL. Only property used for purely religious purposes.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. I make this inquiry for the purpose of stating that I am reliably informed that the property in the District of Columbia used for religious purposes and exempt from taxation amounts to over $25,000,000.

Mr. ODELL. Substantially the same is true in every State of the Union.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that; but I wanted to make the statement at this time publicly in the House without offering any criticism or undertaking to say whether the state of things is proper or improper.

Mr. ODELL. Has the gentleman made any effort to have this class of property brought under taxation?

Mr. CANNON. No; not since the revision of the District laws, in 1878, when the law provided, in spite of what objection I could make, that certain property should not be subject to taxation. But, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make this statement for another purpose. I desired that the House should know and that the country should know that there was $25,000,000 worth of property in the District of Columbia used for exclusively religious purposes and exempt from taxation, and that this bill adds to it.

Mr. ODELL. The gentleman is mistaken. This bill does not add to it, because it merely divides up property that is now held by this religious corporation.

Mr. CANNON. Well, there is $25,000,000 worth of property used for religious purposes in this District that is not subject to taxation. Now, I do not propose at this time to offer any amendment to this bill, but I think the bare statement that I have made will suggest to a dozen gentlemen here provisos and amendments to this bill, because after all this looks to me very like taxing the public to promote religion.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does not the gentleman think that it is greatly to the credit of the city of Washington that it has $25,000,000 worth of church property?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; but I recollect the extract from Thomas Jefferson read by the gentleman's colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] a few days ago, speaking of the impropriety of taxing anybody to support a religion that his mind and conscience did not concur in; and, therefore, without desiring to make any motion at this time, I find here this camel—not a gnat—that goes through without challenge, and I want to call attention to it while it is passing.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LAWS RELATING TO STREET-RAILWAY FRANCHISES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the House joint resolution No. 53, and I ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution to compile and publish the laws relating to street-railway franchises in the District of Columbia.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That there be printed and bound into one convenient volume, at the Government Printing Office, all the various acts of Congress relating to street-railway franchises in the District of Columbia; and that 500 copies of the same shall be furnished for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of and distribution by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; but the usual number shall not be printed.

Amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out the words "joint resolution."

Strike out the resolving clause, which contains the words "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled," and insert the words "Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring)."

These changes simply make the resolution concurrent instead of a joint resolution.

In line 6, page 1, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "two," and in line 7, same page, strike out the words "one thousand" and insert the words "four hundred."

In lines 8 and 9 strike out the words "two thousand copies," and in lieu thereof insert the words "two thousand five hundred copies."

In lines 10 and 11, same page, strike out the words "but the usual number shall not be printed."

Mr. RICHARDSON. The report of the committee proposes to amend the resolution so as to make it a concurrent resolution.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

DAYS OF GRACE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5105) to abolish days of grace on promissory notes, drafts, etc., in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on all notes, drafts, checks, acceptances, bills of exchange, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness made, drawn, or accepted by any person or corporation after this act shall take effect, and in which there is no expressed stipulation to the contrary, no grace, according to the custom of merchants, shall be allowed in the District of Columbia, but the same shall be due and payable as therein expressed, without grace.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from the date of approval of the bill.

Amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In lines 5 and 6 strike out the following words, "this act shall take effect," and insert in lieu thereof, after the word "after," in line 5, the following words, "the 1st day of January, 1897."

Strike out section 2.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF GAS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6994) relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Washington Gas Light Company of the District of Columbia is authorized to charge and collect, after the passage of this act, for illuminating gas furnished to and paid for by the Government of the United States, and other consumers in the District of Columbia, at the rate of not exceeding $1 per thousand cubic feet: Provided, That if consumers other than the Government shall not pay monthly any gas bill within ten days after the same shall have been presented, said company may charge and collect from said consumer so failing to pay said bill as aforesaid $1.25 per thousand cubic feet for the gas furnished to said consumer during said month.

SEC. 2. That the Georgetown Gas Light Company, doing business in that part of the District of Columbia formerly known as Georgetown, is authorized to charge and collect, after passage of this act, for illuminating gas furnished to and paid for by the Government of the United States, and other consumers in that part of the District of Columbia, at the rate of not exceeding $1.25 per thousand cubic feet: Provided, That if consumers other than the Government shall not pay monthly any gas bill within ten days after the same shall have been presented, said company may charge and collect from said consumer so failing to pay said bill as aforesaid $1.50 per thousand cubic feet for the gas furnished said consumer during said month.

SEC. 3. That section 1 of an act entitled "An act regulating gas works," approved June 23, 1874, is amended so as to read as follows: "That from and after the 30th day of June, 1874, the illuminating power of the gas furnished by any gaslight company, person, or persons in the District of Columbia shall be equal to 22 candles by the Bunsen photometer, using the English parliamentary standard Argand burner, having 15 holes and a 7-inch chimney, consuming 5 cubic feet of gas per hour; and such gas shall not contain more than 20 grains of sulphur in any form in 100 cubic feet, nor more than 5 grains of ammonia in any form in 100 cubic feet, and shall be free of the impurity known as 'sulphureted hydrogen,' said impurity to be determined by passing the gas through a glass vessel containing strips of bibulous paper moistened with a solution of the acetate of lead, and if any discoloration of the test paper is found to have taken place this is to be held conclusive as to the presence of sulphureted hydrogen in the gas. When the illuminating gas supplied by any company, person, or persons in the District of Columbia shall at any one time be of less illuminating power or of less purity than according to the standard just heretofore given, it shall be so reported by the inspector of gas and meters to the company, person, or persons supplying the same, who shall be subject to a penalty of $100, to be recovered before the proper tribunal and paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia aforesaid for each and every day during which such violation shall continue: Provided, however, That if it shall appear that such deviation from the above-named standards could not have been prevented by ordinary care and prudence, but was occasioned by some unavoidable causes, then the said penalty shall not be enforced."

SEC. 4. That any gas company or person placing a gas meter in service in the District of Columbia that has not been inspected, proved, and sealed, as provided for by the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," for each and every such violation of said act shall be subject to a penalty of $100, to be recovered before the proper tribunal of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That a clerk shall be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to perform clerical services and assist generally in the work required in the laboratories of the inspector of gas and meters, and his compensation shall be $1,000 per annum. That an additional inspector of lamps shall be appointed by said Commissioners, and his compensation shall be $900 per annum.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill the reason for fixing the price of gas furnished by the Georgetown Gas Light Company at $1.25 per thousand instead of at $1, the price authorized to be charged by the Washington Gas Light Company in the first section of the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the bill under consideration, the committee has taken a different method of getting at the facts from that heretofore pursued by Congress. The question considered by your committee has not been what gas might cost in Denver, or in Kansas City, or in Boston. The question that we have investigated is, how much does gas cost the companies here delivering it to their consumers? Some weeks since I addressed a letter to the Washington Gas Light Company asking them for a sworn statement of their business affairs for the year 1895, showing, first, the amount of cash and assets on hand on January 1, 1895; second, the total receipts during the year 1895, and the total disbursements for the same period.

That statement was rendered under oath by the secretary of the company, and from the statement the committee found that the total receipts for gas sold by the cubic foot for the year 1895 was $999,510.42; receipts from park lamps, street lamps, and from offal, added to that, made a total of $1,137,219.01. This was the amount of the total receipts of the company for their product for the year 1895. On the other hand, the statement shows that the disbursements were: For permanent improvement, $198,305.86; for interest paid on bonds, $72,000, and for dividends, $600,000.

Now, here comes the question that interested the committee and which is of interest to the people of Washington; that is, how much did this gas, for which the company received $1,137,219, cost the company, delivered to the consumers? The company show by their statement that for oil, coal, taxes, and all general expenses of manufacture and distribution they paid out $623,579.94. The amount of gas made by the company was about 900,000,000 cubic feet. It costs them, delivered to the consumers, 69.28 cents per thousand. This, according to the sworn statement of the company, is what it costs, all expenses paid, delivered to the consumers. The committee think that $1 per thousand feet is a fair price to be charged for gas in the city of Washington.

Now, to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri. By this bill we fix the price in the city of Washington at $1 per thousand feet, and in what was formerly known as the city of Georgetown at $1.25 per thousand feet. The Georgetown Gas Company made in 1895 38,000,000 feet of gas; the Washington company 900,000,000 feet. The statements submitted by the Georgetown company, covering a period of years, show that gas has cost them more than $1 per thousand. The cost has been at least 25 cents per thousand in excess of the cost of gas to the Washington company. Owing to the limited output of the Georgetown company, and the limited sale of the gas, it has cost them more delivered to their consumers than that manufactured by the Washington Gas Light Company. The statement of that company for a series of years also shows that they have not been able to earn quite enough to pay the fixed dividend of 8 per cent on their stock, without any surplus being accumulated.

Mr. GROUT. In this estimate of the cost of gas to the Washington company—69.28 cents per thousand—there is reckoned the interest which appears in this statement, $72,000, is there not?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. GROUT. What is meant, then, where the statement says that the total disbursements were as follows—permanent improvements, $198,305.86; for interest paid on bonds, $72,000.

Mr. BABCOCK. I explained that matter fully, but I will again call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the item of $623,579.94 for oil, coal, taxes, and all general expenses of manufacture and distribution does not include the item of $72,000 for interest.

Mr. GROUT. No; but this item of $72,000 for interest stands independent in the sworn statement. That must be, I presume, interest on the cost of the plant.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is the amount that the company paid last year as interest on their bonds.

Mr. MILNES. Bonds amounting to $1,200,000.

Mr. BABCOCK. If you add that amount paid as interest to the cost of the gas, it would be an addition of about 8 cents per thousand feet.

Mr. GROUT. I simply wanted to understand the statement. I believe it does not specify that $72,000 was interest on bonds.

Mr. BABCOCK. The cost per foot—69.28 cents—covers all money necessarily expended for salaries, taxes, distribution, material, manufacture, etc.—all expenses necessary in order to deliver the gas to the customers. Let me say further to the gentleman from Missouri that the present price of gas in Georgetown is $1.50 per thousand feet as against $1.25 in the city of Washington.

This bill proposes to raise the candlepower of the gas furnished from 16 to 22. The test of the Government inspectors for 1895 shows that the candle power of the gas was about 19; so that this bill would raise the illuminating power about 15 per cent. The committee has been able to figure up how much it will reduce the income of the company to make this reduction of 25 cents per thousand—about $200,000 a year; but it has been impossible for us to say how much this improvement in the quality of the gas—this increase of illuminating power—would cost the company, whether it will add 5 per cent, 10 per cent, or 15 per cent to the cost of the gas. Taking the business of 1895 as a basis and figuring the gas at $1 per thousand, the company would still be left in such a position that they could pay the dividend of 10 per cent on their capital stock, unless the increased cost of gas on account of the increased illuminating power should make a material reduction in the amount of profit realized by the company.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask my colleague on the committee as to the necessity for the last paragraph of section 5, in the following words:

That an inspector of lamps shall be appointed by said Commissioners, and his compensation shall be $900 per annum.

I wish to ask because the inquiry was propounded to me by several gentlemen, and I was not able to answer it. Is this a new tax on the District of Columbia revenues, or is it already provided for by law, and provision made for it in one of the general appropriation bills?

Mr. BABCOCK. This is for an additional inspector of lamps in the District of Columbia. The Commissioners have asked for it, stating that their force at present available is not sufficient for the purpose, and that when complaints were made about the quality of the gas and the conditions of the lamps they were unable to give proper attention to them because of the lack of force.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would suggest to my friend from Wisconsin that section 5 ought to go out of the bill, because the regular appropriation bill provides the force necessary for the District of Columbia. I make no comment now as to the merits or demerits of the proposition, but only suggest that an ample force is provided, and can be provided, in the regular appropriation bill; and I think the gentleman in charge of the bill should consent that this provision be stricken out and the force provided for in the usual way.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let me ask my friend from Missouri if there is such a provision in the legislative bill or any other appropriation bill, for an inspector of lamps for the District of Columbia?

Mr. DOCKERY. There is. It is provided in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. There is one, I know, but it is not sufficient, and the Commissioners ask this increase.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Still, if my friend will allow me, if another is required, it will be only regular to provide for it in the annual appropriation bill, instead of on this bill, and I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri is a proper one.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest, therefore, at the proper time, that the gentleman allow the provision to go out of the bill, and if necessary the Commissioners can present this question to the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and provision can be made for it in the regular bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is only one question, and that is this: I will ask my friend from Missouri whether such a provision, if it comes from the Senate, would be obnoxious to the point of order in the House?

Mr. DOCKERY. It would not, because a force of inspectors is carried in the appropriation bill now.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was absent from the Hall a few moments, when the gentleman from Wisconsin was explaining the bill. There was a point with reference to the price of gas in Georgetown to which I called his attention.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that while he was out my colleague made a statement and explanation with reference to the price of gas in Georgetown as compared with that in Washington.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend at the proper time the first paragraph of the bill, and hope the gentleman in charge will accept the amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. What amendment does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. DOCKERY. After the word "feet," in line 8, in the first section of the bill, insert:

Except that gas consumed in public lamps for lighting the streets, highways, and public grounds in the District of Columbia shall be paid for at such rates as Congress may from time to time prescribe.

In other words, I wish to except from the operation of the first section public lamps, so as to bring this bill in harmony with the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. But if the gentleman will permit me, this is not proposed to cover street lighting at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. It does not cover the street lighting?

Mr. BABCOCK. No.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It strikes me that the amendment would be wholly unnecessary. Congress has the right, of course, when it makes the appropriation, to fix the rate at which street lighting shall be done.

Mr. BABCOCK. This has no reference whatever to street lamps. They are not paid for by the thousand feet. They are paid for at an annual rate, and this is not intended to cover street lighting at all.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Line 7 in this first paragraph covers it—"the rate of not exceeding," etc. Of course you can change that rate as you please.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well.

Mr. BABCOCK. At the request of several gentlemen on the floor, Mr. Speaker, the committee consents to strike out section 5 of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think only the last item in section 5, not all of the section. But beginning with line 5 of section 5.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, beginning with line 5, the provision in the following words:

That an additional inspector of lamps shall be appointed, etc.

Mr. PITNEY. I think you had better strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly, let the entire paragraph go out, because all of it is properly and should be included in the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Very well. Then I move to strike out the entire section.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill S. 1247, and I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is that the free-library bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be better to consider it in the usual way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROUT). The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. BABCOCK. Then I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a free public library and reading room is hereby established and shall be maintained in the District of Columbia, which shall be the property of the said District and a supplement of the public educational system of said District. All actions relating to such library, or for the recovery of any penalties lawfully established in relation thereto, shall be brought in the name of the District of Columbia, and the Commissioners of said District are authorized on behalf of said District to accept and take title to all gifts, bequests, and devises for the purpose of aiding in the maintenance or endowment of said library; and the Commissioners of said District are further authorized to receive as component parts of said library collections of books and other publications that may be transferred to them.

SEC. 2. That all persons who are permanent or temporary residents of the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of said library, including the use of the books contained therein, as a lending or circulating library, subject to such rules and regulations as may be lawfully established in relation thereto.

SEC. 3. That the said library shall be in charge of a board of library trustees, who shall purchase the books, magazines, and newspapers, and procure the necessary appendages for such library. The said board of trustees shall be composed of nine members, each of whom shall be a taxpayer in the District of Columbia, and shall serve without compensation. They shall be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and shall hold office for six years: Provided, That at the first meeting of the said board the members shall be divided by lot into three classes. The first class, composed of three members, shall hold office for two years; the second class, composed of three members, shall hold office for four years; the third class, composed of three members, shall hold office for six years. Any vacancy occurring in said board shall be filled by the District Commissioners. Said board shall have power to provide such regulations for its own organization and government as it may deem necessary.

SEC. 4. That the said board shall have power to provide for the proper care and preservation of said library, to prescribe rules for taking and returning books, to fix, assess, and collect fines and penalties for the loss of or injury to books, and to establish all other needful rules and regulations for the management of the library as the said board shall deem proper. The said board of trustees shall appoint a librarian to have the care and superintendence of said library, who shall be responsible to the board of trustees for the impartial enforcement of all rules and regulations lawfully established in relation to said library. The said librarian shall appoint such assistants as the board shall deem necessary to the proper conduct of the library. The said board of library trustees shall make an annual report to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia relative to the management of the said library.

SEC. 5. That said library shall be located in some convenient place in the city of Washington to be designated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon the recommendation of the trustees of said library: Provided, That in any municipal building to be hereafter erected in said District suitable provision shall be made for said library and reading room sufficient to accommodate not less than 100,000 volumes.

SEC. 6. That the expenses of the maintenance of said library, including salaries of employees, shall be treated as among the current municipal expenses of said District, and it is hereby made the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to include these expenses in the annual estimates of the District of Columbia, transmitted by them to Congress, in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 11, 1878, regulating the transmission of said estimates and the appropriations by Congress to meet the same.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia of this House, we favorably report this bill. It is a Senate bill, to take the place of the House bill first reported. This bill is different from the House bill only in the additions that are made in line 13, page 2, to line 16, and then the striking out of the section numbered 6 in the original bill. The committee favor this bill because they think it is the better of the two.

We would impress upon the members of the House that it is a bill which is of great importance to the citizens of this District. The Congress of the United States has, to a certain extent, undertaken to be a common council for the District of Columbia, and for that reason it must take care of measures such as this.

This public library is necessary for the city of Washington, because we all know that it is one of the great cities of the country, the capital of our nation, and many millions of dollars have been expended in beautifying its surroundings and ornamenting its public buildings; but in this one matter of a public library the city is entirely deficient. It may be said, concerning books in the District of Columbia, that in the midst of plenty there is great want; or, as the mariner said when in mid ocean—

Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink.

You have here the great Congressional Library, the departmental libraries, and private libraries to the number, possibly, of 50, but there is not in the city of Washington a single library which the common, average citizen can use at his discretion, taking therefrom books at such hours as he can devote to such purposes, taking the books home to inform himself upon such things as the citizens of this District and of this country ought to be informed upon.

This want is sought to be met by this bill. If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the report of the Senate committee and the report made by the House committee, they will find that all the citizens of the District seem to be unanimous in favor of the passage of such a bill. The Commissioners of this District strongly recommend its passage. The labor organizations of the District are unanimously in favor of it. Thirty-five thousand school children over the age of 12, who need books such as will be provided in this way, demand the passage of such a bill. The public press of the District is unanimous in favor of it. It is a want which can be met only in this way.

It is a singular fact that Washington is the only great city of the country in which there is not a free public library maintained at the public expense. A year ago some of the public-spirited citizens of Washington created a public library, which they are maintaining by private subscriptions. If this bill is passed we have the assurance of General Greely, the president of that association, that the library so constituted will be transferred to the trustees, and that will be the foundation of the great library which is to result in the future.

The report also gives us statistics as to the various libraries throughout the country. In the great neighboring city of Baltimore Mr. Pratt met the want existing there, and established a great free library; but that library is maintained at the public expense; and there are in this great country of ours over 600 towns smaller than Washington which have libraries maintained at the public expense, by public taxes. Now, as the Government is joint administrator with the District in its own affairs, we think it no more than proper that this bill should be passed, that the matter of maintaining such a library should be an item of public expense, to be provided for according to the usual manner of such expenses.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman a question. I have hastily read the bill as it passed the Senate. I understand the gentleman proposes now to ask the House to pass the Senate bill?

Mr. WELLINGTON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand from the reading of it, I fail to find any appropriation, definite or indefinite, in it.

Mr. WELLINGTON. There is no appropriation in the bill, and no appropriation can be made unless it comes before Congress and is a part of the public expense of the District, and then it would be appropriated for in the appropriation bill as are all other items of the annual expenses of the District.

Mr. CANNON. It does provide that this library board, to be appointed by the District Commissioners, shall have authority to appoint a librarian, and that that librarian shall have power to appoint as many assistants as the board may deem necessary. However, I take it that staff is practically not to be appointed, or the librarian to be appointed either, until estimates have been submitted and Congress shall have appropriated the money, either in bulk or in detail, for that expense. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. WELLINGTON. That is the idea, and that in the meantime such public subscriptions as are given may be received. There already have been accumulated, as I understand, $9,000 subscriptions by the citizens of the District, which will be transferred and handed over to these trustees as soon as they organize the library.

Mr. CANNON. I fail to find any provision in the bill, and therefore I would ask the gentleman if there is such, as would enable this library board, being the creature of Congress, if the bill is enacted, to expend any money, however the money may be obtained, until it is first authorized by Congress.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I think no expenditure can be made of the public money unless it is authorized by Congress in an appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose if the bill should be enacted there is time in which to make a roster and make such appropriation as might be necessary?

Mr. WELLINGTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has answered the question as I supposed he would, and it seems to me that we agree as to the legal effect of the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say a word to the gentleman. I have been informed that quite large sums of money have already and will be contributed to the board of trustees that this bill creates from private sources as well as a large number of books?

Mr. CANNON. I suppose without legislation, however, that the board, administering a trust of this kind, created by Congress, estimates will have to be submitted as other estimates are submitted to Congress for final legislation. And I take it that the donations that have been made can be utilized until they are used or other provision is made.

Mr. BABCOCK. There will be nothing in the bill to prevent the receiving of subscriptions.

Mr. CANNON. The subscriptions might be received. I believe, as a matter of fact, they are authorized.

Mr. WELLINGTON. They are authorized to receive the subscriptions and books.

Mr. CANNON. I find on first page, line 10:

The Commissioners of said District are authorized on behalf of said District to accept and take title to all gifts, bequests, devises for the purpose of aiding in the maintenance or endowment of said library; and the Commissioners of said District are further authorized to receive as component parts of said library collections of books and other publications that may be transferred to them.

It seems to me that these subscriptions and gifts may be received at once; but if the bill is enacted into law, it seems to me that then you must get an appropriation before there can really, practicably, be a step taken that would look toward opening the library so as to make any expenditure of money.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I think that would be the idea—that no positive steps would be taken until Congress made the appropriation.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he will accept this proviso to the last section:

Provided, That no liability shall be incurred under this act unless Congress shall have first made an appropriation for the objects herein stated.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I think that would be agreeable to the committee. It certainly is to me.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then the committee will accept the amendment?

Mr. WELLINGTON. I see no objection to it. The committee adopts the amendment the gentleman proposes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Have it considered as accepted.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent to offer this amendment at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Move it as an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. General debate has been closed.
Mr. DOCKERY. I offer the following proviso to section 6.
The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no liabilities shall be incurred under this act unless Congress shall have first made appropriation for the objects herein stated.

Mr. DOCKERY. That comes in after the word "same," in line 10 of page 4.
Mr. WELLINGTON. That is an amendment to the last section of the bill.
Mr. DOCKERY. It is a proviso to the last section of the bill.
Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, if it is in order, I submit the following amendment in place of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont proposes a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.
The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out section 6, on page 4, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:
"SEC. 6. That all the expenses of maintenance of said library, including salaries of the employees, shall be charged upon the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. DOCKERY. I withdraw my amendment for the time being.
The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Vermont is offered as a substitute for the section. The question will be first taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri in order to perfect the text.
The amendment of Mr. DOCKERY was adopted.
Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man in my desire to see the national capital become the Mecca of the scientific and fashionable world all over this planet. I fully appreciate everything that has been said by the ardent friends of this measure in behalf of the establishment of a public library in this city, but I am inexorably opposed to having the people of Vermont and of all the States in this Union taxed for a purpose here in the city of Washington such as no man on this floor would be bold enough to advocate in his own district.
Mr. WELLINGTON. If the gentleman will yield to me a moment, I wish to say that he seems to be mistaken when he says that the State of Vermont will be taxed for this library under this bill, because in effect, when the Government assumes to pay one-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia, it is not as a gift to the city of Washington or to the District. As the gentleman probably knows and understands, if the property in this District were to be taxed as it would be under a municipal government, where the people had a right to govern themselves, we would have to contribute about as much as we do now, and this bill only proposes to treat the expense of this library as a portion of the municipal expenses of the District.
Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the explanation of the gentleman from Maryland does not touch the point that I raise. This question is not a new one. It has been here before, and the older members know exactly what it means. This is nothing but the entering wedge to the expenditure of millions of money for the erection of a mammoth public library in the future, with thousands and thousands of expense every year to be incurred in maintaining that library.
Now, what is the necessity for this library that is prayed for, as we are told, by all the people of this District? It is asked for by the Commissioners; it is asked for by the Confederation of Labor; the gentleman in charge of the bill says that the public press asks for it, and, in fact, I have no doubt that every man, woman, and child in the District of Columbia is clamoring to have this expense incurred, one-half of which will ultimately be a charge upon the people of these United States, and the constituents of every member on this floor will have to pay his portion thereof. Now, the argument that the people of this District ask for this means just as much as it would mean if the gentleman, or if I, should ask to have somebody else assist us in paying the portion of an expense that we had chosen to incur for some purpose of our own. Let me inquire what would be thought of a member of the State legislature of South Carolina who should rise in his place and propose to tax the people of that State for erecting a library building for the residents of the State capital? What would be thought of a member of the legislature of Vermont who should rise in the legislature and ask to have the people of the State taxed to build and maintain a public library in the town of Montpelier, the State capital, for the use of the people of Montpelier? Has any such proposition ever been made in any of our States at home? Never.
Mr. GROUT. If my colleague will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that just such a proposition has been made in the State of Vermont—a proposition for the people of Vermont to contribute out of the State treasury to the erection of a library in the town of Montpelier and in every other town in the State.
Mr. POWERS. Exactly. We have a law in our State, as they have in many of the States, by which the State treasury appropriates a uniform sum for all the towns in the State to aid them in maintaining libraries, and if this bill was broad enough, catholic enough, sensible enough in its spirit and its language to provide for the establishment of libraries in the several States as well as in the District of Columbia, my colleague's criticism would be exactly in point. But it is not. The proposition here is to tax the people of the United States—for doing what? Not for paying a part of the municipal expenses of the District of Columbia incurred for the maintenance of their streets, lights, water, and other necessary municipal expenses, but for the creation of what may be termed a luxury in this city. What demand is there for this, Mr. Chairman? The reports show that the city of Washington to-day has more books per capita than any other city on the face of the globe.
Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. POWERS. I will answer that question that you are going to ask in a moment. [Laughter.] As I have said, this city has more books per capita than any other city on the face of the globe, and all that it is necessary to do in order to accommodate the public demand for a library is to pass a bill opening the Congressional and the other existing libraries in Washington to the public. But what are the facts?
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] has expired.
Mr. POWERS. I ask a little further time.
Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the gentleman from Vermont be allowed time to conclude his remarks.
There was no objection.
Mr. POWERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, all that Congress has to do in order to provide books for every man, woman, and child in the city of Washington is to open the doors of the libraries we now have. We are told that the Congressional Library, containing seven or eight hundred thousand volumes, is not open to the common people of the city of Washington. Why not? Because Congress has authorized such regulations as practically close it to them. But the power remains in our hands to remove those regulations and to open the doors of that Library to the people. What guaranty have we that this new library will not be locked up in the same way that every other library in the city of Washington has been locked up?
We have been told that the libraries in the several Departments of the Government here are not available to the clerks in those Departments because the clerks are kept busy until 4 o'clock p. m., and at that time the doors of the libraries are closed. Very well. Then pass a vote that will keep the doors of those libraries open until 5 o'clock. That will not cost the people of this country anything; it will not cost the people of the District of Columbia anything. In that way those books will be open to the employees of the Departments. Now the common people, the laboring men of the city of Washington, can get access to all the libraries we have here, provided Congress has the good sense to resolve by legislation that it will open the doors of these libraries to those people. That is all that is required.
In this day of economy, when this Republican Congress is pledged to an economical administration of public affairs, I wish to remind my Republican friends that they can not afford to open a gap here for the expenditure of millions of money that will come hereafter. I want to point out to the country that the representatives that they send here are doing for the people of this city what never would be done for their people at home. We are told, Mr. Chairman, that the act of union which made the District of Columbia and the Government of the United States copartners in the administration of affairs in this city obligates Congress to make these generous appropriations. I deny it. There is nothing in the act of 1878, there is nothing in any legislation upon this subject anywhere, that obligates Congress to spend a copper in this way unless it sees fit to do so. It was never contemplated that the people of the nation should be taxed for every conceivable luxury or extravagance that the people of this city might demand at their hands.
Again, it is said that the Government owns a large amount of property in this District which is not taxed and that therefore it ought to contribute to various expenses of the District. What are the facts about that? The property that is owned by the Government of the United States in this District is a class of property that is nontaxable the world over. Who ever heard of taxing Government property for the payment of local expenditure? Who ever heard of taxing, for instance, a statehouse in the capital of one of the States for the maintenance of the government of the city where it is located?
Mr. WILLIAMS. Montpelier does not tax your capitol building in Vermont.
Mr. POWERS. No, sir; Montpelier does not tax our State capitol, and Montpelier does not tax any public property that belongs to the State of Vermont. Such a thing has never been heard of. All the authorities on this subject lay it down as a fundamental proposition that public property can not be taxed for private ends.

But this act of union that was inaugurated by a ring of real-estate speculators at the outset, and has been kept on foot by the same agencies since, provided that the United States Government should go to bed with the District of Columbia and incur one-half of the expenses of running this city and District. Now, whether that was a wise or an unwise scheme at the outset, it has proved an eminently unwise one in practice. The people of this District are continually clamoring for more and more out of the public Treasury. They are not content to have us educate their children, maintain their streets, light their city, provide them with water, and do everything of that sort; but we have been called upon recently to appropriate money to support their private charities, to pay out any sort of voluntary contribution which they may see fit to demand at our hands. And there are plenty of gentlemen in Congress only too willing to open the pocketbook of the Government for this purpose.

As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, public property is nowhere, except in the city of Washington, subject to taxation for local benefit, and why should it be here? The location of the capital at this point and the erection of the various public buildings that have been put up here since the capital was located here have enhanced the value of the property of the residents of this District a hundredfold or more. Why, then, in justice should gentlemen insist that we should go beyond the fair limit and scope of the original act of union and be made to contribute to all these extravagant expenses? True, they ask for it; and they do so for the very good reason that they want these things and do not want to pay more than 50 cents on the dollar for them. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the good people of this District, I say that they are asking of this Congress too much, and the time is close at hand when they will be driven back to take care of themselves. The people of this country will never stand this extraordinary demand, this extravagance of expense, that is continually pressed upon us here in Congress.

This public property ought not to be taxed; but we have agreed that it may be to a reasonable extent. Now, let us live up like men to that agreement. It is the law of the land. And it is no answer to say, "Why don't you bring in a bill to repeal the law?" That is an old chestnut that has been cracked on this floor for the last ten years. It amounts to nothing. It is begging the question. We are repealing the law so far as this proposition is concerned if we adopt this amendment. We are putting the expenses of this public library upon the people who are to have the benefit of it. The people of the nation are to have no advantage from this library unless they come here to live. Many members of Congress in both Houses are residents in the city of Washington and taxpayers here. They are directly interested in having this bill passed. But, sir, if I owned property in this District I should feel myself disqualified from voting on this question on the ground that I had a present, personal, financial interest in it.

But I do not care anything about that. The simple fact is that it is one of the extravagances that the people of the District of Columbia desire to indulge in for themselves. If they must have a library let them pay for it. I have pointed out the fact that there is no need for one, that the claim is the veriest nonsense in view of the conditions existing here, with the number of libraries accessible, and that if such a necessity does exist it can be met by legislation opening the libraries already here to the public. I have pointed out the fact that if the library is to be built by anybody at all it should be built by the people themselves who are to be benefited by it, and not by the people at large, who have no interest in the matter whatever.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the library is such a good thing as is claimed by the advocates of this measure, why not allow an amendment, such as that already proposed, to place the expense of maintaining it altogether, with the salaries of the officials in charge of it, on the revenues of the District of Columbia?

But, I will venture to assert that the moment that amendment is adopted the bill will fall to the ground; the gentleman in charge of the measure will withdraw it, as was done on a similar occasion a year ago. They do not want the bill at all unless the people of Maryland, the people of Vermont, and other States of the Union are taxed to maintain it. I do not believe in a doctrine that would entail such an expense upon the people of the United States outside of the District. I believe in living up to the strict letter of the agreement made by the Government with the people of the District of Columbia, and then stopping right there. I do not believe it will be best even to repeal the act of union; but we ought to put our foot down on the expenditures which are inaugurated here and carried out to such an extravagant extent.

Why, Mr. Chairman, only a few days ago a bill was considered on this floor for the benefit of the people of the District of Columbia where an appropriation of $102.50 was made for every arc light burning in the streets of this city, and according to the bill it was to provide an illuminating standard of 1,000 candlepower, and yet in my own little town in Vermont we are paying for 2,000-candlepower arc lights $50 a year, and in the town of my colleague, the strongest friend of the bill, they are paying the same price. Why should we come here and, for the benefit of the people of the District of Columbia, pay just double the money for lighting the streets of the city that is paid elsewhere?

Mr. Chairman, the only sensible thing for Congress to do is to put this expenditure proposed in the pending bill on the treasury of the people of this District, who are to have the exclusive benefit of it, and then you are doing exact justice and equal justice to your own constituents.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman consent to my amendment to his proposed amendment?

Mr. POWERS. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, which has been passed upon already, and I will modify my amendment accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont moves, as a substitute to the pending amendment, a modification of his amendment in the form which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That all the expenses of the maintenance of said library, including salaries of the employees, shall be charged upon the revenues of the District of Columbia: Provided, That no liability shall be incurred under this act unless that Congress shall have first made appropriation for the objects herein stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute which has just been read.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Vermont, the gentleman last upon the floor, is troubled in his mind about this "arrangement," as he calls it, between the people of the whole country and the people of the District of Columbia. I hardly look upon it as an arrangement, in the meaning of the term as the gentleman expresses it. The people of the United States, Mr. Chairman, are governing the District of Columbia, and that fact should not be lost sight of; and they are doing it in their own way.

I do not understand that there is any union between the people of the District of Columbia and the General Government. The General Government is supreme here, and has inaugurated a system. This system commenced in 1878, by which Congress provided that there shall be an equal division of the municipal expenses of the District of Columbia between the people of the District and the people of the whole country, each bearing one-half. The Congress of the United States takes exclusive charge of this arrangement and controls the expenditure of every dollar of money in the District.

In other words, the people of the District have no voice whatever in the government of the District, but are under the control of Congress. So I object to calling this arrangement "a union," as the gentleman expresses it. It is not. The arrangement exists because of the sovereign power of Congress in the premises. The people of the District had no voice in the matter and have not now. Congress made the arrangement to suit itself, and it ought now to be willing to stand by that arrangement. And my colleague also says let us live up to that agreement. In the first place, he stigmatizes it as an agreement foisted upon the people of the country by a "ring of land speculators" in Washington by which the people of the whole country got into bed with the people of the District of Columbia, and so forth. Mr. Chairman, I must object to this characterization of the organic act of 1878, but of this a little later.

After having thus stigmatized the origin of this act, he says let us live up to it, and a little later we will see how he proposes to live up to it. He says the idea of appropriating money in any of the towns of Vermont, for instance Montpelier, the capital of the State, for a library like this would be considered preposterous by the people of the State. But I reminded him that just exactly that thing is done in the State of Vermont, for we have a law to the effect that when a town or village appropriates money for a public library the State itself, in aid of the same purpose, will give a fixed sum or an equal sum, I do not recollect exactly. Many towns in Vermont are availing themselves of this provision, so that it is true the State treasury does contribute to the support of libraries in the several towns of the State, and because the people of Vermont believe that public libraries form a part of the public education.

Mr. POWERS. It is $100 from the State treasury for every $100 appropriated by the town; but the question I ask is this: Did the legislature of Vermont ever tax the statehouse, or any other State property, to pay that?

Mr. GROUT. It is not proposed to do it here. But I am obliged to the gentleman for calling my attention specifically to that.

Mr. Chairman, everybody knows that a State government is a small affair compared with the Government of the United States, consisting, as it does, of 45 States. The statehouse at Montpelier, which is a very respectable one, cost only $140,000 or thereabouts. It is built of Barre granite, the best that the country affords, and there is also an addition in which is the State library, and this is all the public building or buildings belonging to the State that there are in Montpelier; and everyone will see at a glance that with that single building the capital of Vermont does not furnish a parallel case with Washington, when more than one-half of the real estate here belongs to the United States Government. Of course the whole State does not bear one-half of the municipal expenses of Montpelier, and the reason is obvious. The situation is entirely different from what it is here.

There is no sort of parallel between the case supposed by the gentleman as to Vermont and the case which we are considering here. The gentleman is so filled with a strange sort of spirit—I hardly know what to call it—that he all the time keeps attacking this half-and-half system of expense and saying in substance it is unfair, and then he will say, "Let us live up to the contract," and, Mr. Chairman, from it all I am quite unable to understand what he really means.

The time of Mr. GROUT having expired, by unanimous consent (on motion of Mr. WELLINGTON), he was allowed to continue his remarks.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question right there? He is stating that the Government owns more than one-half of the property in this District.

Mr. GROUT. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In making up that computation, do you not include the very streets of the District and the parks, which exist for the benefit of the city, rather than of the Government?

Mr. GROUT. I do not think the streets are included. Whether the parks are included or not, I can not say. Possibly they may be. I should suppose, upon the whole, they would be; but not the streets.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I think the gentleman is mistaken in his figures.

Mr. GROUT. Consider the vast amount of money in the public buildings in this District, which are exclusively for the use of the General Government. It is an immense amount, and upon a fair valuation it is said to be more than one-half. There is no parallel between Montpelier and Washington on that line. Probably the value of the statehouse, as compared with other taxable property in Montpelier, is not more than one to twenty or thirty, and perhaps a larger number even, and I submit to my friend and colleague whether it is at all fair to make the comparison.

A word as to this "ring performance" in 1878, by which the gentleman says speculators foisted this plan of government upon the unsuspecting people of the country. I want to say to the gentleman that it had the approval of some of the most eminent men ever in Congress. I am speaking now to my colleague [Mr. POWERS], because I can not help but feel that he does not represent properly the feeling of the State from which we come when he criticises and pitches into the people of the District of Columbia at every opportunity. I say this in all kindness. Mr. Chairman, that "ring performance" in 1878, of which the gentleman spoke, by which the land speculators put the people of the District and the people of the country into bed together, had the approval of such men as Edmunds and MORRILL in the Senate, pretty good names not only in Vermont but throughout the whole country; and in the House of such men as Judge Poland and C. W. Willard, if I am not mistaken as to the time when he served, and Governor Hendee, pretty good names, all of them, throughout our State. And these are the men from Vermont who, at the dictation of this ring of land speculators, approved of the act of 1878. And, Mr. Chairman, it has always had the approval of the Representatives from Vermont on this floor, and has never been criticised by any of them except the gentleman. It really has the approval also of the people of Vermont, who are willing, nay, want, the people of Washington as well provided for as they themselves are, especially as the people of Vermont are undertaking to help govern the people of Washington. And this is just what this library bill proposes to do.

It is not a proposition to make this city a fashionable Mecca, as my colleague has said, a resort for people from all parts of the habitable globe, but it is to establish a free public library for the benefit of the masses. Such a library has been termed by some one "the university of the working man." It is proposed to establish it, as was stated by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], for the benefit of the 33,000 children of the public schools, many of whom are from the families of Members and Senators, and who will be profited by a public library; for the 20,000 Government employees who want it, and for the 23,000 workingmen of the District, thousands of whom have petitioned for it. And my colleague spoke of the indorsement of this project by the Federation of Labor. Of course they would. They would approve it, because they are a class of men who feel the necessity for and desire information, and our people in Vermont want the people of the capital city of our country to have just as good advantages as they have themselves. You have seen what they do. They provide that every town that will raise money for a free library shall have money out of the public treasury in support of the enterprise. They provide that every town may, out of its municipal fund, establish a public library—and there is every reason for it, if not greater reason for it, in this city—and when they have done that they shall have $100 as a premium out of the public treasury. Every town is allowed to provide for itself and assess its taxable property precisely as is proposed in this case.

The gentleman speaks about the arrangement for opening the Congressional Library. He says that all that is to be done is for the Committee on the District of Columbia to do it. Ah, Mr. Chairman, that is not an easy problem. Let the gentleman himself propose to open the Congressional Library every night and he will find it not so easy a matter. But suppose that were done. It is not located in the central part of the city. Neither is the new Library building, nor the library connected with this House, in this building, located so that it would be accessible for the laboring people. It is not centrally located for the people of the District. It should be located within reasonable reach of the people who would be its patrons. Mr. Chairman, I think this proposition for a free library every way a worthy one. In no place is it so necessary as an antidote and offset to the diversions of a great city as in the great city itself.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me? The last Congress refused to inaugurate a library which should be supported one half by the Government and the other half by the District of Columbia. Does the gentleman now propose to reverse that action?

Mr. GROUT. No, Mr. Chairman; I do not propose to reverse any action of the former House, because that which the gentleman alludes to was not the action of the former House. It was simply a failure to act. They did not approve it; but, if the gentleman will allow me, he does not state the case correctly. The House did not approve the bill—the last House—because it was mixed with another question. The bill then brought in proposed to take a portion of the public building being erected on the Avenue—which, I think, could well enough have been appropriated to that use—and that prevented action on the bill. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and my friend from Texas, Governor SAYERS, neither of whom has had a word to say against the bill as now framed, were, I think, unnecessarily sensitive as to the bill of last session on the ground that it was to invade this building on the Avenue. They had been instrumental in appropriating the money to erect that building, and it was wise economy to make ample room or a large amount of room for public purposes.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman has referred to me. Let me put this question to the gentleman.

Mr. GROUT. Very well.

Mr. SAYERS. The public building on the Avenue known as the post-office building was authorized by Congress in order to provide for the Departments of the Government.

Mr. GROUT. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, does the gentleman contend that the gentleman from Illinois and myself were wrong in opposing its use for library purposes?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SAYERS. Now, do not wince.

Mr. GROUT. I am not wincing. I am only anxious to answer you——

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman contend that we were wrong in insisting that that building should only be used for the purposes for which it was erected?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I did not say you were wrong. I said that I thought you were unduly sensitive on the point of having a portion of that building used for a public library.

Mr. SAYERS. Do not you think that gentlemen should be sensitive on questions of expenditure?

Mr. GROUT. Yes, sensitively just, if you please. That is what I would have every man be in the expenditure of public money. But I thought then, and I think now, that the necessary space in that building for this library could not have been put to a better purpose than to have so appropriated it. But I say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that neither of those gentlemen now object to the bill and I infer they are for it.

Now, since the gentleman has interposed this question, let me say that I think this library ought to go right into that building. It is where the people will go for their mails, it is centrally located, and the library would be more convenient of access there than anywhere else. But at the same time this bill does not so provide. As I said a moment ago, the gentleman from Tennessee did not correctly state the action of the House a year or so ago, because he did not state it fully.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the gentleman does know that, independently of the question of location, Congress refused to shoulder one-half of the expense of this proposed library upon the people of the United States.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, neither I nor the gentleman know any such thing, for the statement is not correct. I do not think the gentleman could have been present when that bill was discussed in the last Congress, because his memory is usually correct, but gentlemen who are present now and who were present on that occasion will remember that the principal stumbling block then was that the library proposed to invade this new building on the Avenue.

Mr. McMILLIN. I was present and I remember what occurred.

Mr. GROUT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I can not account for the obliquity of the gentleman's memory. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. There are a great many things for which the gentleman from Vermont can not account.

Mr. GROUT. That is a fact. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee longer. I believe that this library is something which the people of Washington ought to have. There is one more question that I want to touch upon before I sit down. It is connected with the proposition of my colleague from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], and it is this: He says let us carry out the contract. He calls it a contract; I do not. I call it the sovereign act of the American people by their representatives in Congress, as I have already stated. But he says let us carry it out.

Now, that act provided that the municipal expenses of the District of Columbia should be equally divided between the people of the whole country and the people of the District, and the only question in that connection is, whether this proposed library is properly an item of "municipal expense." The only way to determine that question is by referring to the practice throughout the country.

Now, a large number of cities have been referred to by the committee where the maintenance of libraries is regarded as a legitimate item of municipal expense. I have here a list of cities, over fifty in number, as I am told, in which the maintenance of public libraries is treated as an item of municipal expense. And this fairly brings this proposition fully within the provisions of the act of 1878, beyond all possible question, and, as I have already said, every community, every State, which believes in libraries; which believes in education; which believes that intelligence, not ignorance, is the foundation on which the pillars of this Government rest, ought to favor this bill.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposition contained in the sixth section of this bill is that the total expense of the maintenance of this proposed public library for the District of Columbia shall be included in the regular annual estimates of the Commissioners of the District and paid, one-half out of the National Treasury and one-half out of the District revenues. The amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] proposes that the total expense of the library shall be paid out of the District revenues. I am in favor of that amendment and I hope it will prevail. I think I can show that the amendment will do no injustice to the citizens of the District of Columbia, and that if it does not prevail an injustice will be done to the public Treasury.

The contract, so called, between the District of Columbia and the National Government contained in the act of 1878, which divides the expenses of the District government equally between the District and the National Treasury, has been much discussed and more or less misunderstood, but it is not necessary for me to say a word about it at this moment. There is some doubt raised also as to whether this public library is called for, and as to whether this particular method of providing for it is wise. But I simply insist, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that if there is a public demand for this library, it is a demand for something which will be peculiarly beneficial to the District of Columbia, and that the District revenues are adequate for the purpose of maintaining it and should be devoted to that purpose. I hold in my hand a table showing the estimate of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the revenues of this District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897. Their estimate is that those revenues will amount to $3,225,081.56. I have the figures here showing the revenues of the District of Columbia from the year 1890 down to the present time, and I find that they have never been less than $2,434,750.91. That was in the fiscal year 1891; but in 1894 and 1895 they were over $3,000,000 per annum.

The revenues of this District are the result of an assessment, the rate of which is fixed by law. The law provides that 1½ per cent shall be levied, as a fixed rate of assessment, upon all the taxable property of the District of Columbia, and therefore as private property increases in value the necessary consequence is that the District revenues increase from year to year. Now, gentlemen of the committee will observe that under the act of 1878 these District revenues bear only one half of the general expenses of the District government, the other half coming out of the National Treasury. What are the annual expenses of the District of Columbia, as shown by the annual appropriation bills? The amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1896 was $5,559,263.97. The amount reported to the House in the District appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, was only $5,225,365.97. One-half of that comes out of the revenues of the District. What is one-half of that? It is $2,612,683. What are the estimated revenues of the District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897? They are $3,225,081; leaving a surplus of $612,398. That is the amount by which the revenues of the District for the next fiscal year will exceed the share of the District of the public burdens of the District under the contract, so called—the act of 1878. Therefore, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the District revenues fixed by law will be so far in excess of the District burdens fixed by law that there will be ample money in the District treasury out of which to support and maintain this proposed public library.

Mr. GROUT. The District revenues, in other words, are just what Congress makes them.

Mr. PITNEY. They are just what Congress has made them.

Mr. GROUT. The matter is entirely under the control of Congress.

Mr. PITNEY. So is any law under the control of the law-making power; it can be changed or repealed at any time. The law that one-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia shall be paid out of the public Treasury is also repealable.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly; but let an act be brought in for the repeal in a manly fashion.

Mr. PITNEY. Why does not the gentleman bring in a bill of that kind? We are now acting upon a definite proposition—to inaugurate a public library here to be supported out of some public fund. Out of what public fund shall it be supported? Shall it be supported entirely out of the public funds raised by local taxation, which are ample for the purpose—funds raised under a law which in this respect is fixed, so that the rate of assessment can not be reduced without a change of the law—a change which no one proposes? Or shall this public library be supported out of a fund one-half of which is raised by taxation upon citizens of the whole country?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DINGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. CALL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1699) for the relief of William Loring Spencer; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, when this question came up in the last Congress I opposed the passage of a measure providing for the establishment of a free library in this District to be paid for one half by the Government and the other half by the citizens of the District, contending that it was a luxury and not a necessity. I opposed that measure on the same grounds as I do this. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I took the ground which my friend from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] has taken to-day, that there does not exist any necessity for this library from the fact that the Congressional Library is here, easily accessible to every citizen within the limits of the city—its benefits subject to his use, either directly or indirectly. In addition to that, there is in nearly every Department of the Government here a library for the benefit of the employees of the Department; and these libraries are easily accessible to residents of the District if they desire to avail themselves of the privilege.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or can be made so.

Mr. TALBERT. Or, as my friend from Mississippi suggests, if they are not so accessible, they can easily be made so by a little legislation.

Now, my friend from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] says that the Government owns over one-half of the property in the District of Columbia. Even if that were a fact, which I do not at all admit, does that property read books? Does it want a library?

This library if established will be solely for the benefit of the citizens or residents of the District of Columbia; the Government property can not be benefited by it either directly or indirectly, so that to tax it for that purpose would be wrong.

Again, whence comes the demand for the establishment of this free library? I have seen no petition which has come to members of this House from citizens or residents of this District in favor of the establishment of this institution. It seems to me that these demands come from members of Congress and from Senators who own property here, especially those who live here and who expect to live here the remainder of their lives, not from residents or citizens of this District. Now, there seems to me, without making any charge, to be a little selfishness along with this demand.

Then, Mr. Chairman, it has been said on this floor that the employees of this Government come here from every nook and corner of the nation to reside. That is a fact which can not be denied. But let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that twenty-odd million dollars is paid every year to these employees; and they are the best paid laborers on the face of God's green earth, receiving salaries anywhere from $1,000 to $2,000, $2,500, and $3,000 a year, salaries which ought to enable them to buy books if they need them. They are more able to do so than the laborers all over this broad nation, who are getting, many of them, not more than 50 cents a day, many of them less. Then, is it right to tax even these poor people for the benefit of others so much better paid?

I say, then, it would be a great injustice to tax the great mass of the people in this case for the benefit of the few. Such a measure is against the theory of the Government under which we live. I say this bill is wrong in theory and wrong in practice. It is based upon a wrong principle; and consequently I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, which places the matter where it properly belongs, so that those who wish to dance must be made to pay the fiddler.

Then, again, it has been argued here that there has been a union between the General Government and the District of Columbia, and that the District of Columbia has no representative on this floor. This was done in 1878. That is a fact. It is said that under the circumstances they can not without our assistance establish a free library. Then, Mr. Chairman, let us wipe out this provision in regard to a division of expenses, one-half to be paid by the Government and the other half by the people of the District. Let us give these people a charter of their own. Let them go ahead and establish a free library and pay for it out of their own pockets, as other citizens do throughout the length and breadth of this nation.

It has been argued here that the legislatures of various States appropriate money for free libraries at the capitals of the respective States. Admitting that such is the case, I say that it is wrong in principle, and we should not encourage any such thing here. Two wrongs do not make a right. By following so bad an example we can not give any sanction of justice or right to such a proceeding. I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, which requires the residents of the District of Columbia to have a free library, if they like, but requires them to do as other people do all over this broad land, pay for it out of their own pockets.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will disagree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS]. In the first place, sir, I want to say a word or two in answer to the charge made twice on the floor of this House—first by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] and next by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], I believe—that the demand for this library does not come from the citizens of the District of Columbia, but that it seems to emanate from members of Congress who are members of this committee and have interests in the District of Columbia in the way of real estate.

Mr. POWERS. I beg to say——

Mr. WELLINGTON. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. POWERS. I made no such statement as the gentleman imputes to me.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Well, the gentleman from South Carolina made that statement, and the gentleman from Vermont intimated the same thing.

Mr. TALBERT. I said that these demands seem to come from that direction; but I made no charge.

Mr. WELLINGTON. If it was not stated, it was insinuated.

Mr. TALBERT. If the shoe fits you or anybody else, you will have to wear it.

Mr. WELLINGTON. The statement was not as manly as if it had taken the form of a direct charge. Insinuation or innuendo of that kind is no more defensible than a direct statement. I want to say for myself that I own no property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not say you did.

Mr. WELLINGTON. But you intimated that the members of this committee, the Congressmen supporting this proposition, were not backed up by the sentiment of the District of Columbia—that they were influenced in supporting the measure by a desire to benefit themselves.

Mr. TALBERT. If the gentleman will allow me just a moment, I want to say that I have a right, as a member on this floor, to believe exactly what I please in reference to these matters.

Mr. WELLINGTON. The gentleman has not a right to "think so loud," then.

Mr. TALBERT. And in reply to that, sir, I am like the gentleman whose lawyer did not talk to suit him; I have a right to think my own thoughts.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Do not think them too loud.

Mr. TALBERT. When he rose in court and asked, as he could not be permitted to say anything, if he might just think a little, the judge said "Yes," and the man said: "Well, then, I think you and all these lawyers are a set of damned rascals." [Laughter.] I have a right to think just as I please, and I think that there is some selfishness in this matter, as I stated on the floor, and I now repeat it.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Well, the gentleman may think as he pleases; but as a member of this committee, I wish to state to him that there is no selfishness in connection with the proposition pending here. I am a member of this committee, and I voice the sentiment of the committee and the people of the district and of Washington when I say that this proposition is one that meets the hearty approval of all of the people of the District, and that there is no such "speculation" in it as the gentleman seems to imply. I hold in my hand a document signed by 13,000 organized laborers of the city asking for this thing. I hold here the recommendations of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in favor of it. All recommend it, and all of them apply for this privilege.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word in reference to another matter which is not personal. It has been said that this bill should pass, if at all, with the amendment suggested here that the expense shall be paid exclusively from the revenues of the District of Columbia. I do not believe in doing it that way. If Congress entered into a contract, as has been said, with the people of the District of Columbia and became liable for one-half of the expense of the District, Congress ought to carry out its agreement in good faith; and I think the library is just as much a necessity for the people of this District as the public school system. It is an educational matter. What, in this country, must we depend on in the future for the perpetuation of our republican system of government? The patriotism of the people. How will you make them patriotic? By circulating knowledge among them. I want to educate our people. I want to educate them not only in the public schools but in libraries throughout the country, and I want to give every man an opportunity, when he goes home at night, to be able to go to the library and take with him such books as he may desire to read for his enlightenment or pleasure in the evenings at his home.

This library is established, as I understand it, for all the working people of this city. I think, and I believe it is the judgment of all men who give impartial consideration to the matter, that the great capital of the nation should not be without a circulating library; further, I believe that such a library should be established here and conducted at the public expense. The circulating libraries in all of the great cities of this Union are so conducted, at the expense of the State.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] said that in his State they do nothing of the kind; and yet a moment after his colleague [Mr. GROUT] rises to remind him that in that very State of Vermont they do exactly what is proposed by Congress to do in this case; that is to say, that when they establish public libraries in the towns, they pay one-half of the cost from the State treasury. I know that in the State of Maryland, and in all the school districts, dollar for dollar of the expenses incurred for libraries is paid by the State, and it is right that it should be done. I believe that Congress could do no better thing for the people of this country than to bear one-half of the small expense supposed to be incurred here. It may not amount to very much in the future. It is a small amount now. I am sure that so far as I have knowledge of the people of this District, and so far as the matter has come under the consideration of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the people here will give such donations and assistance to the library in future as will make the expense of maintaining it a small amount in the end.

I call for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman answer this question?

Mr. WELLINGTON. I will if I can.

Mr. CROWTHER. Why not open up the great public library here, under proper regulations, to the people?

Mr. WELLINGTON. The gentleman can answer that as well as I can. A proposition of that kind is now before Congress. It is not proposed that the Congressional Library shall be used for this purpose. Besides that, even if that were done, how many workingmen could reach it; how many will be benefited by it; how many will be allowed to take books home; how many will go there at all?

Mr. CROWTHER. Under regulations in vogue elsewhere in the country they can have a proper use of the library, I should think.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Well, the people of the District are entitled to something of the kind. In all great cities of the country they have these libraries and we ought to have one here. I believe that you could do no greater good to the people of this District than to have such a library, giving to the workingman, to the workingwoman, to every school child, to every man who is employed in the Departments, the right to go every night and get such volumes as may be desired, to read.

Mr. PITNEY. I move to strike out the last word. I make that formal motion in order to complete the statement I was making when I had the floor a few moments ago.

In answer to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], I will say that this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] does not propose to defeat the public library; it does not propose to deprive any man who is entitled to the benefit of that library of the full benefit of it. What it does propose is, the proposed library being a local benefit, which will inure to the people of the District of Columbia, that local taxation alone shall contribute to the support of it. Nobody at this time is proposing to repeal what is called the contract of 1878.

Mr. WELLINGTON. But you do, in this manner.

Mr. PITNEY. No; we do not. The contract of 1878 applied to all public purposes then authorized by law——

Mr. GROUT. All municipal expenses.

Mr. PITNEY. Very well. If it was a contract at all, it could not be an unlimited contract. It must apply to definite objects, and the objects to which it did apply were those which then existed, and Congress held at the same time the power to say that those objects should not be extended without limit and without the voice of Congress being heard upon the question.

But my point is, that there is money enough in the District revenues to support this library and a dozen others like it, without calling on the National Treasury for one cent. The District revenues for years past have exceeded the amount of District expenditures under the annual District appropriation bills by about half a million of dollars. There was an old debt due from the District of Columbia to the National Government, amounting in the first place, I think, to more than a million of dollars, and there has been an annual provision that the surplus District revenues should be applied, to the extent of $300,000 a year, to liquidate that debt. There is a provision to the same effect in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the year 1897, and if that becomes a law, as it will undoubtedly, it will liquidate almost the last vestige of that debt due from the District to the National Treasury, so that for the year following there will be an available surplus of half a million or more in the District revenues. I think that surplus ought to be applied in part to the support of this public library, if a public library is needed.

Mr. TALBERT. If the gentleman has concluded what he wishes to say, I desire to say one more word in regard to this matter. As I understand it, the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] means simply this, and nothing more—that the Congress of the United States proposes to give to the residents of the District of Columbia the right to establish a free library if they desire to. They claim that they can not do it without a guaranty from Congress. The adoption of this amendment gives them the right to do so if they wish, and they can pay their money or take their choice and let it alone. That is my idea of it.

Mr. GROUT. I move to strike out the last word. I wish to reply with just a word to what the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] says about the District revenues. Mr. Chairman, the revenues of the District are always just what Congress makes them. Of course they are now determined by a law which is upon the statute book and will operate until Congress sees fit to change it.

Mr. PITNEY. Does anyone propose to repeal that part of the statute which fixes the rate of assessment at 1½ per cent per annum?

Mr. GROUT. By no means now, Mr. Chairman; but the time may come when that rate should be changed. That is not an unalterable thing, like the laws of the Medes and Persians. It is the amount which Congress has thought would raise sufficient revenue for necessary expenses for the District and to liquidate its indebtedness.

Mr. PITNEY. Will it not be a perfectly simple matter, if the rate is ever reduced, to reduce it by so much only as will leave sufficient to provide for this library?

Mr. GROUT. Why, certainly, we can change it so as to place this burden wholly upon the District. We can change it so as to place on the District several other burdens which it has been proposed to do first and last, by members of this House who are constantly attacking, not squarely in the front, but upon the flank, the act of 1878, which divides the District expenses, as before explained.

Of course it is competent for Congress to change that act at any time, but we ought to do it in a manly and square way. The language of the act of 1878 provides that the "municipal expenses" shall be divided half and half between the General Government and the District of Columbia.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GROUT. Not now; I will in a moment. If the expense of this library is not municipal in character, then it should not be divided. But if municipal it should be divided. Kill the bill outright if you want to; but do not undertake by this niggardly, this indirect, this cheeseparing method to kill it and then say you are simply trying to place the burden where it belongs. Is it a municipal expense? Here are 58 or 59 towns enumerated at random, including Boston, Mass.; Nashua, N. H.; New York, San Francisco, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Newark, N. J., from the gentleman's own State, where $48,511 are appropriated annually for the public libraries. In all these and many other places it is borne as an item of municipal expense, the city making appropriations therefor; and it is a proper local municipal expense.

If it is not a municipal expense, then put it out of this bill, and vote down the bill squarely, like men. That is the way to treat it. Do not pretend to be carrying out the spirit of the act of 1878 and yet run a knife under the fifth rib of that act every chance you get. This is a municipal expense, as I have given it from fifty-odd cities, which demonstrates the fact so that every man of common sense can see that it is a municipal expense. Why, you provide a jail, but have no library. Place a library over opposite the jail. You license a dram shop and saloon, so that the victims may go through the dram shop and saloon to the jail. Place a library over opposite the dram shop and saloon. It is economy for the people of the whole country as well as for the people of the District to do this. Besides, to say that we have in this the capital city of the Republic no free circulating library which the plain, common people can reach is a scandal upon the intelligence of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield to my friend the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] for a question.

Mr. PITNEY. I believe that every one of the cities which has a public library, according to this list, has also a Government building owned by the Government of the United States——

Mr. GROUT. The city of Boston has expended almost $2,000,000 on a library building. I do not know whether or not there are Government buildings in all those cities or——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Nashua, N. H., has not a Government building.

Mr. PITNEY. You did not wait until I finished my question.

Mr. GROUT. I thought I did.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I presume no member on this floor would deny the proposition that a free public library for the use of the citizens of the District of Columbia is most desirable, and that everything that this House can properly do to promote so worthy an object should and would most cheerfully be done. This bill, however, proposes not only that there shall be a free public library, but that the people of my district and your district, and of every other district on this floor, shall pay one-half of the expense of that public library. Now, sir, in my district we have not less than six or eight free public circulating libraries, and we do not ask anybody out of the cities in which they are established to maintain the expense of any of them. It is argued, however, that the District of Columbia is a ward of the nation; that we own a large amount of property here, and therefore we should, because of the act of 1878, whereby we agreed to pay one-half of the necessary expenses of the government of the District, extend it to a free public library. Why not also extend it to free public baths? They are quite as necessary as a library.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, we have done so. We established the bathing pool on the Potomac at the public expense.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Very good. That simply shows the fact that the District of Columbia is one which has a hundred members on this floor representing it while every other district in the country has but one.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Does the gentleman think that every member of this House should not feel some interest in the great capital of his country? I think that this District ought to have every member of this House to represent it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Is this to come out of my time?

Mr. WELLINGTON. Yes, sir; or it can come out of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, Mr. Chairman, if that is a good reason why this Congress should vote to establish this public library, one-half of it at the expense of the people of the United States, then tell me this: The city of New York has public buildings belonging to the Government of the United States worth, I apprehend, from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000, and yet when the city of New York paves the streets around those public buildings the Government of the United States does not make provision to pay one penny of the expense.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It does, provided they come to Congress and beg through a law authorizing it, but there is no general law authorizing it.

Mr. GROUT. Why, it is a matter of constant practice. The appropriation bills show it every session.

Mr. CHICKERING. It is not a matter of constant practice. There has not been such an appropriation for years.

Mr. CONNOLLY. For many years there has been no such appropriation, and there is no general law authorizing it. Now, if the property owned by the Government in the District of Columbia is to be made a pack horse to carry the burdens for all the property of this District, why not put part of the load borne by the city of New York, part of the load borne by the city of Chicago, part of the load borne by the city of St. Louis, by Boston, by Philadelphia upon the Government of the United States, because all those cities have their public libraries? In fact, however, they maintain those libraries at their own expense. Mr. Chairman, after having investigated these laws, I say that the greatest frauds imposed upon the people of the United States are imposed by means of these District of Columbia laws, whereby one-half the expenses of this District are borne by the Treasury of the United States. You gentlemen who come from rural districts and from the interior parts of this great country, think of it! The law limits the rate of taxation on real estate in this District to $1.50 per $100 of valuation, and there is no law or regulation made by Congress to determine how the valuation shall be made, and I venture to say that property in this city worth $10 a square foot is not assessed at exceeding 25 cents per square foot.

Mr. GROUT and Mr. POWERS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] is recognized.

Mr. POWERS. I will yield to my colleague if he desires to make a statement.

Mr. GROUT. I shall take but a moment. Here is an appropriation in the current appropriation bill "for macadamizing Federal street, running between two main inclosures, also used as a highway by the city of Springfield, but the property of the United States, $3,000." I cite this simply to show that it is customary for the Government to bear its share of the local expense of street improvements where it has property.

Mr. CHICKERING. I think that is the only case on record in five years. It is not the custom.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the United States bearing its pro rata share with the District of Columbia in establishing a public library in this great city, and if it could be made the largest library in the world I would still vote for the proposition. The gentleman from Vermont in his argument a few moments ago said that the people of the United States were going to bed with the people of the District of Columbia. He can speak for himself, but he has no right to speak for the balance of the people of the United States. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen talk of opening up as a circulating library the great library now in this Capitol. That is an absurd proposition, because, as I understand it, every book that is copyrighted finds a resting place in that library, and there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of volumes there that can not be duplicated, that are out of print, and that never will be put in print again. Therefore, I say it would be absurd to contemplate for one moment opening up that great library as a circulating library for the use of the people of this District. Furthermore, the location of it, where it is now and where it will be, is not suitable for the convenience of the toiling thousands of this District, who have access to libraries only after working hours, after 4 o'clock or after 6 o'clock in the evening.

Mr. Chairman, I have had no protests from the State of Indiana against this legislation—a State that has a public library in every school and in every township, supported by the State, a State that has such a large school fund on hand that the interest upon it pays the expense of conducting the schools throughout the State. I am in favor, sir, of voting, if you please, the people's money, in conjunction with the money of the people of this District, to make this the most beautiful capital in the world. We have as much right to appropriate money for a public library in this city, where the people can feed their intellectual souls, as we have to appropriate money for the care of the public parks, which are the breathing places for the people of this city, and, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I will cordially vote for this bill as it was reported.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very patiently to the various gentlemen who have submitted remarks in favor of the original proposition, but I have not yet been favored with a single argument that should commend itself to an impartial legislator upon this floor. My colleague [Mr. GROUT] holds up the printed report of the committee and says that it contains a list of 50 or more cities that are supporting public libraries at the public expense. Supposing that were true, what does it prove? It is not true in point of fact, because the total number named is only 29, and in that number are included cities in England, in Scotland, and elsewhere. But supposing it were true that there are 50 cities supporting public libraries, that is simply an argument in support of my amendment.

Mr. WELLINGTON. The statement is true. I have the list here.

Mr. POWERS. I took only the printed report. But assuming it to be true, I repeat that the fact is simply an argument in support of my amendment. What I am contending for is that the city of Washington, in harmony with the practice of these other 50 cities, or whatever the number may be, should support its own public library. The city of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, does not come up to Vermont, or Maine, or New Hampshire, or elsewhere and ask for contributions to support its public libraries. It pays for them itself.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. POWERS. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. GROUT. If this is a proper municipal expense, why should it not, under the act of 1878, be divided between the people of the District and the General Government?

Mr. POWERS. That is the point I was coming to. I say it is not a proper municipal expense within the contemplation of the framers of the act of 1878. My colleague has said that our own representation from Vermont on this floor and at the other end of the Capitol favored that legislation. That is undoubtedly true. Senator Edmunds and Senator MORRILL and the representation of Vermont on this floor undoubtedly supported that bill. But I want to say that at that time nothing was held up in either House as an expenditure of money to which the people would be called upon to contribute except the ordinary, legitimate, natural, necessary municipal expenses. That proposition was supported by the men of that day. But now "incorruption has put on corruption," and a different order of things has come about.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to submit to the gentleman from Vermont this question: Is it not a proper municipal expense for Montpelier, Boston, and other cities containing these public libraries to tax their people to maintain them?

Mr. POWERS. I say most unhesitatingly, yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then is not this a proper expense for the people of Washington—to have a public library?

Mr. POWERS. Exactly; that is just what I am contending for.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And the act of 1878 having provided for this division of these legitimate expenses of the District, how is the gentleman going to get away from that?

Mr. POWERS. I am going to get away from it on this basis, that the people of Washington should take care of their own library in the same way that they take care of their own horses and buy their own clothes. A library is in the nature of a luxury.

Mr. TAWNEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] yield?

Mr. POWERS. Oh, I yield to everybody.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman state what proportion of the population of the city of Washington are legal residents of the various States?

Mr. POWERS. I can not give the exact proportion.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not that a factor that should enter into the consideration of this question?

Mr. POWERS. It is said that the city of Washington has 275,000 inhabitants. Now, if the gentleman can tell me how many officeholders there are here, he can easily answer his own question. I suppose there are 25,000, 30,000, or 40,000 officeholders in the city of Washington.

Mr. GROUT. If there are 40,000, and each of them the head of a family, would not that make 200,000 on the ordinary basis of calculation of five persons to a family?

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman claim that there are 200,000 officeholders in this city?

Mr. GROUT. No; I said that 40,000 heads of families would represent, according to the ordinary basis of calculation, 200,000 people.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman did not apprehend my statement. I did not say that there were 40,000 heads of families. I said there were 40,000 officials here.

Mr. GROUT. Well, they ought to be heads of families.

Mr. POWERS. Perhaps they ought to be. But then why does not the gentleman "go and do likewise"? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I have a few more propositions I should like to submit. Having offered this amendment, I think I am entitled to a few moments to close the debate upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed five minutes.

Mr. GROUT. I ask that my colleague [Mr. POWERS] have five minutes more to complete his argument.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WELLINGTON. I object.

Mr. POWERS. Well, if they object to having discussion of this matter, we will object to the passage of the bill.

A MEMBER. We expect you to do that.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. POWERS, it was agreed to, there being—ayes 74, noes 41.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the Committee of the Whole rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia, and had directed him to report the same back with several amendments and with the recommendation that it be passed as amended.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendments, they were agreed to—ayes 79, noes 37.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 162) regulating proof of death in certain pension cases;

A bill (H. R. 1712) granting to the First Regiment North Carolina State Guard two condemned cannon; and

A bill (H. R. 2300) to incorporate the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree of Scottish Rite Masonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 167) for the relief of John O'Keane, of the State of Washington—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1699) for the relief of William Loring Spencer—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CARE AND CURE OF INEBRIATES.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 818) to provide for the care and cure of inebriates in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to establish and maintain within said District a hospital for inebriates for the treatment and cure of persons suffering from the habitual excessive use of alcoholic liquors, which said hospital shall be a public institution of the District of Columbia and under the control of said Commissioners.

SEC. 2. That the officers and employees of the said hospital for inebriates of the District of Columbia shall be as follows: One medical superintendent, who shall be paid an annual salary not exceeding $1,800; 1 hospital steward, whose annual compensation shall be a sum not exceeding $600; 1 male attendant, at an annual compensation not exceeding $480. The hospital steward and the male attendant shall be appointed as special police officers during their term of service in said hospital. One matron, at an annual salary of not to exceed $360; 1 cook, at an annual compensation not greater than $180; 1 laundress, at an annual compensation not exceeding $144; 1 female servant, at an annual compensation not greater than $120. All employments for said service in said hospital shall be by resolution of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who may at any time remove any person so employed.

SEC. 3. That all supplies for the hospital for inebriates of the District of Columbia shall be obtained by requisition upon the Commissioners of the District, and all such requisitions and all accounts and vouchers thereof shall be subject to the inspection of the superintendent of charities of the District of Columbia, who shall have full powers of inspection and report over said hospital and all the transactions thereof. Annual and quarterly reports shall be made to said superintendent, who shall recommend annually such appropriations as may be necessary to carry on the work of said hospital. The said hospital shall also be at all times subject to the inspection of the health officer of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have authority to lease premises for the use of the hospital for inebriates, at an annual rental not exceeding $1,800, and to expend for the furnishing and maintenance thereof such sums as may be necessary and from time to time be duly appropriated therefor.

SEC. 5. That the hospital for inebriates of the District of Columbia shall have care of persons of the following classes to the extent of its capacity to receive and treat them:

First. Such persons as may be committed to said hospital by the police court or criminal court of the District; and the judges of said courts shall have power to commit to said hospital for a period not to exceed ninety days any person who may be convicted of the habitual excessive use of alcoholic liquors, who might otherwise be amenable to commitment to the workhouse, and any person so committed may be at any time discharged from such hospital upon proof that he has been cured, and the certificate of the medical superintendent of said hospital may be accepted as evidence in such proceedings.

Second. Such persons as may be recommended for treatment in said hospital by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Third. Such persons as may voluntarily apply for admission in said hospital and pay for treatment and support therein not exceeding $10 a week for every such patient.

Payment in full or in part may be received from patients of the second class, and shall be secured whenever practicable, according to the means of the patient. All moneys received from patients for treatment or support shall be forthwith turned over to the proper officer of the District of Columbia for deposit in the Treasury of the United States under such regulations as the Commissioners of the District may prescribe; and said Commissioners shall have authority to make and to change all regulations concerning the management of said hospital and the system to be pursued therein.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect immediately.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 7 of section 1 insert after the words "alcoholic liquors" the words "opium and cocaine."

In line 9 of section 5 insert after the words "alcoholic liquors" the words "opium and cocaine."

After the word "moneys," in line 24 of section 5, strike out "received" and insert "due."

After the word "shall," in line 25, section 5, insert "be collected by the superintendent, who shall give a bond not to exceed $2,500, and by him shall."

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole, and I make the point of order that under the rules it must be so considered, as it involves an expenditure by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New Jersey point out the provisions liable to his point of order?

Mr. PITNEY. Without looking further, I refer the Chair to section 2, authorizing the appointment of certain officers at certain salaries.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill is unquestionably liable to the point of order and must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ODELL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. DINGLEY in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 818) to provide for the care and cure of inebriates in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill H. R. 818, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill has just been read, and I ask consent to dispense with the formal reading of it now.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill is intended to provide for the establishment of a hospital for the care of inebriates in the District of Columbia. It has been reported with sundry amendments by the committee and with the approval of the District Commissioners.

It proposes to create a hospital for inebriates, and establishes certain conditions in connection with the management of the same. It carries with it no appropriation, but is subject to the Committee on Appropriations for such funds as may be required to carry it on.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to offer an amendment by way of a substitute to section 2. I notice quite a number of officers are authorized by this section of the bill. It may be that all are necessary; but upon further investigation it may be found that some are unnecessary, and therefore, as a substitute, at the proper time I shall offer the following:

The officers and employees of said hospital for inebriates in the District of Columbia shall be such as Congress may from time to time authorize.

The CHAIRMAN. The general debate has not yet been concluded upon the bill.

Mr. ODELL. I ask unanimous consent to close the general debate now.

Mr. PITNEY. I would like a little further explanation as to what the maintenance of this hospital is to cost and where the funds for such maintenance are to come from.

Mr. ODELL. It comes from the appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Mr. PITNEY. Is there any estimate as to its cost?

Mr. ODELL. None whatever, except as to the salaries which are fixed here by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to closing the general debate?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he will not accept this amendment?

I propose instead of establishing a fixed roster, which experience may show to be in excess of the actual needs of the institution, to submit the clause which I have already read, and which leaves it to the Committee on Appropriations to determine from year to year, as the necessities of the institution appear, what the force of employees shall be. Of course, the District Commissioners will submit estimates from time to time.

Mr. ODELL. I see no objection to that amendment. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then I move to strike out section 2 and insert in its place the substitute I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the committee amendments had better first be disposed of.

The committee amendments for the several sections as they were reached were read, as follows, and agreed to:

Insert on page 1, line 7, after the word "liquors," the words "opium and cocaine," also, after the word "liquors," in first subdivision of section 5, line 9, page 3, the words "opium and cocaine," also, in same subdivision, on page 4, line 20, after the word "not," strike out the words "less than" and insert "exceeding" in lieu thereof; strike out, in line 24, page 4, the word "received" after the word "moneys" and insert in lieu thereof the word "due," and in line 25, same page, after "shall," insert "be collected by the superintendent, who shall give a bond not exceeding $2,500, and by him shall."

stitute for the second section. I understand the gentleman in charge of the bill consents to its acceptance.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2 and insert as a new section as follows:
"That the officers and employees of said hospital for inebriates in the District of Columbia shall be such as Congress may from time to time authorize."

Mr. ODELL. There is no objection to the substitute.

The substitute was adopted.

Mr. LITTLE. I wish to offer an amendment to section 5 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 5, page 4, after the word "thereof," add the following:
"And be it further enacted, That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any person to sell, dispense, or otherwise dispose of any intoxicating liquors of any kind within the Capitol building in the District of Columbia, or on the public grounds upon which the same is situated, under a penalty not exceeding a fine of $500 for each separate offense."

Mr. ODELL. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, being entirely on another subject to that under consideration.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, on the point of order I desire to be heard briefly.

The truth of the matter is that my short experience in this body teaches me that the point of order is a very effective weapon, in fact, often the most effective way to dispose of important legislation without allowing a direct vote. It is sometimes very pleasant to avoid making a record to go back home to your constituents. The management of this building, which should commend itself to the moral sentiments of our people, has become the object of their attention and scorn.

I for one believe it to be a public disgrace, sir, that liquors are permitted to be disposed of and sold in the Capitol building of this great nation. This bill seems to be dealing with drunkards. I think it is legitimate to cut off the source of supply that makes drunkards. In fact, I think it would be germane to this bill to prohibit the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia, because if it is a competent matter to treat drunkards who have become complete inebriates, it seems to me it is entirely proper to so amend the bill as to cut off the cause that creates the necessity for the asylum provided for in this bill.

In all earnestness I appeal to the chairman of the committee to permit this amendment, which I offer in good faith, to be voted upon. I do think that every member of this House ought to be interested in driving from this Capitol the sale of liquor. It is not a question of prohibition, but of decency, and I do think it is a public disgrace to have open saloons in the Capitol building. They are nothing short of that. There is no use in concealing it or attempting to hide it. We simply ought to face the situation and say whether we are willing to tolerate it or not. I insist that the amendment is germane and that there is no parliamentary law with which I am acquainted that shuts it out.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to take this opportunity to bear testimony to the personal sobriety of the members of this House. Out of the large number of Representatives it is rare indeed to see one intoxicated. And while it gives me much pleasure to say this, it pains me that this public disgrace should be allowed to continue. You may rule out this amendment, but I warn you that I shall introduce an independent bill for this purpose and press it to a decision. Let us have our Capitol building so managed that we can welcome the visits of patriot or saint, of our wives and children, without the blush of shame.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. LITTLE appealed from the decision of the Chair, but subsequently withdrew the appeal.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I offer the following substitute for section 6.

The Clerk read as follows:

No liability shall be incurred under this act unless Congress shall have first made appropriation for the objects herein stated.

Mr. ODELL. We accept that.

The substitute for section 6 proposed by Mr. DOCKERY was agreed to.

And then (on motion of Mr. BABCOCK) the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DINGLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 818, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

And then (on motion of Mr. LOUD) the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Post-Office appropriation bill, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraph against which a point of order was raised.

The Clerk read as follows:

FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

Eighth. For pay of letter carriers, $12,254,300.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that a point of order was raised against that paragraph. The Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LITTLE. I should like to offer an amendment to that section, if my friend from South Dakota will yield for a moment.

Mr. PICKLER. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. LOUD. I will state that the committee have an amendment to offer to that paragraph, which should be submitted first.

Mr. LITTLF I withhold my amendment, then.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to state, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PICKLER. I do not desire to be taken off the floor, Mr. Chairman. I yielded to the gentleman from Arkansas. I do not wish him to yield to the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas has sent an amendment to the desk.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask that it be read.

Mr. LOUD. I think we could get along better by proceeding in the orderly way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, page 2, after the word "dollars," add the following:
"For the delivery of mail matter at fourth-class post-offices, where the postmaster does not receive exceeding $100 per annum under existing law, he shall be paid, in addition to his present compensation, $10 per quarter for delivering the same to the patrons at his said office. A sufficient sum to carry into effect the provisions of this section is hereby appropriated."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against that. It is unwarranted by existing law.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon that question. This is a matter about which I feel considerable interest, and if I understand anything about the question that we have under consideration in this provision it is the proper delivery of the mails to the patrons of the various offices in the United States. I discover in this bill, just following the provision that I seek to amend, a provision appropriating for horse hire $130,000. I find also a provision for car fare and bicycle allowance, $100,000. I claim that there is no existing law for any such provisions. This is our first bicycle experience, and if we are going to embark upon that in this bill, I think it is just as legitimate that we should pay the fourth-class postmasters, the kind designated in the amendment, for the trouble of delivering their mail to the people.

The amendment does not seek to require them to ride over the country to deliver the mail, but to remain in their offices and deliver it. It seeks simply to provide compensation in that direction. Now, if I understand the point of order against this amendment, it has been raised in the interest of economy. It is a matter that is amusing to the country to see the great spasm of "economy" that seems to have seized the majority on the floor of this House. The fact of the business is that the "grand old party" never has in this country been known or designated as a party of economy. You have always been known and recognized throughout the country as a party that could raid the Treasury quicker than any other party in existence. The fact of the business is, since the Democrats gave you a genuine thrashing in 1892 it has in a measure made political cowards of you, and you have through fear adopted a do-nothing policy. You all know that; and I say this in good nature, because I like my friends personally upon the other side. This conversion to economy reminds me, however, of a familiar couplet that is doubtless known to all of you:

The devil was sick,—the devil a monk would be;
The devil was well,—the devil a monk was he.

[Laughter.]

That reminds me of your claim of economy. Your repudiation by the people in 1892 made you sick, but if you succeed in deceiving the people in 1896 you will soon get well. This amendment is a proposition to give sufficient payment to these men in the country, who are required to do this service in order to bring the public service to the doors or put the mail into the hands of the rural patrons of the post-office.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, I insist that this amendment is not in violation of the rule, and in offering it I do it, as I believe, in the interest of the brawny-armed, big-hearted, and sun-tanned patrons of the soil. This bill increases the appropriation for free delivery, I believe, more than $5,000,000 over that of six years ago, and yet this small pittance that I ask in this direction is refused upon a point of order. The points of order seem, so far as this discussion has gone, to be turned peculiarly in the interest of my distinguished friend from California, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I know he wants to be accurate in his speech that he may send his constituents. The increase in the appropriation for the free-delivery service is $84,000 instead of $5,000,000, which is quite a difference.

Mr. LITTLE. I may be wrong in the figures. The increase from the appropriation made six years ago is about that amount.

Mr. MADDOX. Only four million nine hundred and odd thousand dollars.

Mr. LITTLE. Simply for horse hire the appropriation is $330,000, and for car fare and bicycles it is $100,000. How much you will pay for the service of the men who do this work I do not know; but I think, Mr. Chairman, if we can do this for the men of the cities, surrounded by the comforts of city life, put carriers on bicycles and fine horses, you ought, at least, to pay the honest plebian for the trouble of standing in his office and delivering the mail to the patrons of his office, who must now attend to all his official duties without any compensation scarcely. There are, sir, some 12,000 of these postmasters whose pay does not exceed $15 per annum; and it seems to me just as legitimate, just as competent, to say that they should be paid for that service as it is for you to pay for bicycles and horses in the cities to deliver the mail from three to seven times a day.

It may please the committee and be in the interest of the public service that this has been adopted, and I have no objection to it as far as it is right, but I do demand that every section of the country shall be treated with equal justice in the matter of the delivery of the mails. If there are but 12 men receiving mail in a rural district, they are as much entitled to their mail as 12 of the richest men in a great city, and I have the right to demand it for them. I do insist that the amendment is entirely within the rule. It does not increase the appropriation beyond the recommendations of the Postmaster-General, and I take it that this is a time where every man ought to be willing to grant the small allowance that this amendment calls for.

If you will make it as much as you pay for bicycles and horses for the service elsewhere, I will accept it; but if you insist on cutting us off without any allowance for this service, the people, in my judgment, will remember you. It is true, as my distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] sometimes says, that the farmer has but few representatives here. While I am not very much of a farmer at this time, I do know those people; I know them in my own district and in many other portions of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. I know them in the back districts, where the neighborhoods are sparsely settled, and I say that they ought to have an opportunity to receive their mail at least once in seven days. You give a mail delivery to the rich seven times in one day; in the name of justice, give it to these honest and patriotic citizens once in seven days, and if you do even that they will be satisfied.

It seems that the wealthy can always find friends upon this floor. But when anything is asked for the benefit of the plain country people, the chairman of the committee raises a point of order, which is readily sustained by the Chairman. The Republican majority is still joined to its idols, and still adheres to its time-honored motto, "God bless the rich; the poor can beg." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to hear further discussion on the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to be heard a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I intended to submit an amendment at this point on behalf of the committee. I desire to get back to where we left off Saturday evening. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] raised a point of order against this whole provision, or so much of it as might change existing law, and he said he desired an explanation of the bill—of the segregated items. Now, if this Committee of the Whole desires a statement of the motives which governed the committee in making this segregation, I think they are entitled to it.

Mr. PICKLER. I made the point of order against all paragraphs that were new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman could hardly make the point of order against a paragraph until it was reached.

Mr. PICKLER. I could have it pending, however.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as paragraph 8 is concerned, the Chair is ready to rule on the point of order now.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I was saying that the gentleman from South Dakota had asked an explanation of the reasons which governed the committee in segregating these items, and that I thought it was right that the Committee of the Whole should understand those reasons, and if it is agreeable I will proceed in that line now.

Mr. PICKLER. And I trust the gentleman will state as he goes along which are new provisions.

Mr. LOUD. Certainly. But I can hardly make the explanation in five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have as much time as he requires.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I assume at the outset that this House ought to act intelligently upon all matters that confront it. I may be assuming a great deal when I say that the action of the Committee of the Whole on Saturday evening was wholly without reason, and that if any investigation had been given to the subject, or if gentlemen could have listened and understood what they were doing at that time, probably not three members would have been opposed to the proposition as it stood in the bill. Now, I ask gentlemen to give me their attention, so that we may have an intelligent bill going out of this House to the other end of the Capitol, so that we may not send a bill over to the Senate (about which we complain so much at times) and have to rely upon them to send us back an intelligent measure.

On Saturday evening the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was seeking by his amendment to force the First Assistant Postmaster-General to pay clerks in third and fourth class offices more money than they are now receiving. The only thing accomplished by the amendment adopted, however, was to circumscribe the First Assistant, limiting him to $600,000; whereas, after a close investigation, I find that the Department will need from six hundred and twenty to six hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars during the fiscal year 1897 to properly carry on this service. So that by the amendment adopted on Saturday evening the Committee of the Whole simply curtailed the very item that they desired to extend. I warned gentlemen at the time, but the fact is they were talking to one another and did not understand the full import of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Now, I ask members to pay attention while I state the reasons which governed the committee in making this segregation. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota that there is nothing new in this item except that there is a segregation made in the appropriation bill. I have here a portion of First Assistant Postmaster-General's reports running back to 1891 and 1892. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] can bear me out, because he is familiar with the subject, in saying that the First Assistant Postmaster-General has generally, in his reports, segregated to a great extent these items, but the estimates coming to us from the Secretary of the Treasury have come every year down to and including the present "For free-delivery service" a lump sum, so much money. Any gentleman can examine the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for himself, but I will now bring the committee down to 1896–97 and show them the segregation presented. Here are the items:

ESTIMATE IN DETAIL.

The estimated expenditure on account of the free-delivery service for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1896, and ending June 30, 1897, is itemized as follows:

1.	500 letter carriers, at $600 per annum	$300,000
2.	874 letter carriers, at $800 per annum	699,200
3.	4,632 letter carriers, at $850 per annum	3,937,200
4.	6,800 letter carriers, at $1,000 per annum	6,800,000
	12,806	11,730,400
5.	For promotion of letter carriers (act of August 2, 1892)	200,000
6.	For substitutes for regular letter carriers on vacation (act of June 27, 1894), 12,806 carriers, at $25 each	320,150
	Total fixed by law and admitting of no reduction	12,256,550
7.	For additional letter carriers for extension of service at established offices and for establishment thereof at new offices, equal to 150 carriers for full year	90,000

That is the total increase that the Department asks for for the free-delivery service in the whole country during the fiscal year 1897—

8.	For substitutes for additional letter carriers on vacation	$3,750
9.	For temporary carriers at summer resorts, for holiday emergencies, and to serve the routes of letter carriers employed on local civil-service boards	10,000
10.	For horse-hire allowance	330,000

I beg to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that there is no new item in the segregated estimates of the Department, but it is new in the bill—

11.	For car-fare allowance	$165,000
12.	Bicycle allowance	5,000

Permit me to say that this item goes away back to the years 1891 and 1892—as far as I have the segregated estimates from the Department. Then comes—

13.	All other incidental expenses, including salaries and expenses of confidental agents, letter boxes, posts, furniture, satchels, straps, repairs, etc.	$200,000
		13,060,300
	Estimated credit by change of grade	100,000
	Which is carried every year—
	Leaving a net estimate of	12,960,300

Now, your committee thought that these segregations should properly be carried in the bill, because we found that there was in this car-fare allowance, the bicycle allowance, horse-hire allowance, and incidental allowance the vast sum of $715,000. This amount of money was at the disposal of the Post-Office Department, to be expended in such manner as the judgment of the Department might dictate. We thought this too large a sum to be thus left in its expenditure to the discretion of the Department. Hence, following out the course that had been followed in the original intent of the bill years ago, we thought it proper to present a segregation, and the bill now before the Committee of the Whole is the result.

We then called upon the Department for a segregation of the item of $200,000 for incidental expenses. The committee thought it fair that they should be put in possession of the items for which this money was to be expended; and if the Clerk will read what I send to the desk the members of the House will see what that money was intended to be used for.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1896.

Hon. E. F. LOUD, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In compliance with your request of the 1st instant, I have the honor to submit segregated estimate of expenditures to be made under item 13, free-delivery estimate, 1896-97, namely, "All other incidental expenses, including salaries and expenses of confidential agents, letter boxes, posts, furniture, satchels, straps, repairs, etc., $200,000." At the time the estimate was prepared, in October, it was proposed to expend the $200,000 as follows:

1. Salaries of 50 confidential agents	$80,000
2. Expenses of confidential agents	60,000
3. Furniture and repairs (carriers' routing tables, stools, etc.)	3,000
4. Street letter boxes, equal to 4,000 small size, at $2.60 each	10,400
5. Package boxes, 1,000, at $10.25 each	10,250
6. Letter-box posts and pedestals	5,000
7. Repairing and erecting street letter boxes and package boxes	7,000
8. Freight on letter boxes, package boxes, posts, and pedestals	1,000
9. Painting letter boxes and package boxes	4,000
10. Carriers' satchels
11. Repairing carriers' satchels	1,500
12. Straps	1,000
13. Time cards for street letter boxes	2,000
14. Maps and city directories	3,500
15. 12 mechanics in the 6 largest cities, exclusively employed in repairing boxes and locks, and erecting boxes, planting posts and pedestals, at $900 per annum	10,800
16. All other incidental expenses	1,500

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Chairman, in pursuance of the policy which we adopted, we have simply provided in this segregated form an appropriation of $12,254,300—substantially what the Department estimated—there being a slight reduction in the item for the pay of letter carriers of about $6,000. We have provided for horse-hire allowance $330,000, the amount estimated for that branch of the free-delivery service. If the gentleman from South Dakota will pay close attention, as I believe he is doing, he will see that there is nothing new in this bill except to designate for what purpose this money is to be used.

The next item carried in the bill is $100,000 for car-fare and bicycle allowance. The estimate for bicycle and car-fare allowance was $170,000—$165,000 for car fare and $5,000 for bicycle allowance. As I stated on the floor the other evening, this is a somewhat aggravating subject. We should have been glad to cut it out entirely, if possible; but we see here on the floor the feeling that is created even by the reduction we have made. But I vindicate the reduction upon changes contemplated by street-car service (and when we reach that item I shall ask that it be passed over, because our reduction depends wholly upon another portion of the bill). We have cut this item down to $100,000; and in another portion of the bill providing for electric-car service we provide that the companies carrying the mails on street cars shall carry the letter carriers free where the distance is more than a mile. We thought we would reduce the amount to be used for car fare $70,000. We may have been mistaken in doing this; but we have used our best judgment; and permit me to say that the committee have spent many and many a weary hour in making the segregations here presented. While we may have made mistakes, we have presented them according to our best thought and judgment.

Now, you will find that the estimate for street letter boxes, posts, and pedestals is $15,400, and we thought it should be an item by itself. For package boxes, $10,250; and in reference to that we also thought it ought to be a segregated item. Also for the pay of twelve mechanics in the larger cities, exclusively employed in repairing boxes and locks, erecting boxes, etc.

Now, that brings us to the incidental expenses, including repairs, painting, freight, straps, etc. There were several items, you will see, of $1,000 and $1,500 which we included all together, and they foot up $24,000 in the incidental account. We struck from the estimate $140,000, which was the estimate of the Department for the special agents, because we did not intend to consider that item in connection with the free-delivery service at all, and the result of the labor gives us a total of the several amounts of $12,744,750.

The gentleman from Arkansas assumed that we were making an increase here of several millions of dollars. As a matter of fact, though, the appropriations this year for this service was $12,790,000—that is to say, $46,000 in round numbers in excess of what is proposed by the present bill. We appropriate for the next fiscal year that amount less than is carried in this bill, which will allow a liberal increase in carriers, but of course the principal reduction is $140,000 for the special agents. I will say, however, that the First Assistant Postmaster-General subsequently reduced by $60,000 his estimate, stating that he could probably run it for $80,000, but we eliminated the system altogether from the bill.

Now, if the gentleman from South Dakota desires to make any further inquiry——

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand the gentleman from California, there are no new items of legislation in this bill under the head of the "free-delivery service"?

Mr. LOUD. Not one.

Mr. PICKLER. And the object is simply to lump the expenditure of this amount?

Mr. LOUD. That is all.

Mr. PICKLER. What is this bicycle service that you refer to here?

Mr. LOUD. Well, it is a service where the carriers are delivering a long distance from the office, 1, 2, 3, 4, and sometimes 5 miles away, in cities, and I might cite Chicago as an illustration, where carriers are allowed the use of a bicycle on these long routes. He gets an allowance, but let me say that that is just about sufficient to provide for the grease of the machine, and would hardly meet wear and tear. Otherwise, if this was not allowed, he would have to ride on the cars.

Mr. PICKLER. Would not it be better to have more horses and fewer bicycles?

Mr. LOUD. Well, a carrier can not successfully in the delivery of the mails use a horse. He might of course, in delivering in the country districts, but not in the thickly settled portions of a city. It would hardly be a proper thing to have a horse to carry him from door to door on a route the total extent of which would be perhaps a couple of miles.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman may have explained this before. I did not have the pleasure of hearing all of his speech in the general debate.

Mr. LOUD. It was directed expressly to you. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. But the gentleman is so accommodating today that I am sure I can get all the information I need. If you would tell us something about the improvement in the position of the fourth-class postmasters, it will be very much more interesting.

May I ask the gentleman how many deliveries a day there are in the large cities; take, for instance, Chicago?

Mr. LOUD. I would not like to specify the number in any special city. I should suppose in Chicago they may get as many as six a day in a portion of the city. There are one or two or three cities in the country where I think they get seven deliveries in the business centers.

Mr. PICKLER. How many in the gentleman's own city of San Francisco?

Mr. LOUD. I am not able to say exactly; possibly six in a limited portion of the city; five in some portions; four in others, and two in others.

Mr. PICKLER. How many in Washington?

Mr. LOUD. That I can not tell. That is detail work that I can not get down to in every post-office in the United States, but if the gentleman had listened to a few remarks I made on the floor the other day——

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that he knew something then that he does not now?

Mr. LOUD. Well, if the gentleman will just possess his soul in patience, and not misinterpret my remarks, or endeavor to put words in my mouth, he will get the information he wants. The gentleman is frequently on the floor presenting himself as the one defender of the common people of the country, and I think he is as honest and sincere as the average man who assumes to speak for the people. But the gentleman has repeatedly gotten up here as the defender of the masses of the people, appealing for an increase of salary for a few Government officials, claiming that it is in the interest of the masses of the laboring people, and that is about the ultimate result of the efforts of the special defenders of the masses. They want to get their hands and arms into the Treasury up to the shoulders, to see how much they can pull out for some favored officeholder. Now, I will come back. The gentleman referred to me the other day upon the floor as being a resident of a city.

Mr. PICKLER. I thought the gentleman yielded to me to ask a question.

Mr. LOUD. I thought you had got through. I will answer that question.

Mr. PICKLER. I certainly will not let you go on in that way if I can think of any other question. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. I think I have the floor. The gentleman alluded to me in his usual earnest manner, and, looking at me with profound disdain, in a tone of voice which I should under ordinary circumstances have resented, said I was a resident of a city, and was looking out for the interests of city people alone, and would not listen to any amendment upon this bill, or advocate any proposition that was in the interests of the masses. I will come now to what I was going to present before.

I said upon the floor the other day that I thought this country had run free-delivery mad, and we in this bill are seeking to remedy that condition. We do not appropriate in this bill as much money for the support of the free-delivery service as was appropriated the preceding year. The natural growth of the service, of course you must assume, is something. Now, I assume that the people of the cities are getting more deliveries than they ought to have, and while I do not know that it hurts my feelings much—because we all understand that the gentleman from South Dakota is not in earnest, he is simply talking to his constituents; it is getting pretty near the time to nominate members of Congress—but still to have that thing constantly pumped into me, Mr. Chairman, is somewhat boring, at least. On Friday nights, when I perhaps rise in my place—and I assume that I am as honest in my convictions as the gentleman is, and that is assuming a great deal—when I rise and assume the right to oppose any individual pension claim upon the floor of this House, the gentleman says I am against the interest of the common people; hence the conclusion is that the only person who is in favor of the common people is he who can get the most money out of the public Treasury. Now, I assume that the common people are not particularly interested in this matter of increasing the salaries of Government officials, in order that they may be taxed to support them.

My friend from California [Mr. JOHNSON], too, said the other day that I was not a lawyer. That thing has been said, not concerning me alone, but it is a position in which every layman upon this floor has been put time and time again. I raised a point of order against a proposition which my colleague advanced upon this bill. The gentleman immediately arose in his place—as many a member has done before—and said with great disdain, "Of course the gentleman is not a lawyer," and then halted there, trying to convey the impression that because a man is not a lawyer, therefore he is not gifted with ordinary common sense. When I first came to Congress I heard a story which seemed amusing to me at the time. No doubt the gentleman himself has heard it. Of course the story was made to apply to a particular Congressman, but no doubt it has been applied to many others. It was the story of the man who, when he was first elected to Congress, came here and wondered how the devil he ever blew into Congress, and then proceeded to wonder how the other fellows got here. Many of us have experienced this feeling.

Possibly the innate modesty of my colleague from California—and I know he has a great sense of modesty—may have led him to feel the same sentiment. The gentleman graduated, I see, in 1862, while I did not study law until some years subsequent to that, because I was down here in Virginia holding a consultation with some of my friends from the South at that time. No doubt when the gentleman was presented for examination for admission to the bar, and after he had passed that ordeal, the great sense of modesty in him said, "How the devil did I ever happen to become a lawyer?" But he is a lawyer, and he is a pretty good one. He studied law in 1862. He has practiced it almost continually ever since; but permit me to say, so far as the profession is concerned, that when they look at a statute—and this is without disrespect to the profession—when the average lawyer looks at a statute he looks to see if it can not be broken down rather than that the intent of the law be carried out. Now, permit me to say to the gentleman from Sacramento that, although I am not a lawyer, that although there are many men upon this floor who are not practicing lawyers, we may possibly be gifted with ordinary common sense, and possibly can understand plain English words, and plain English words put into sentences. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

On page 2, in line 21, strike out "fifty-four" and insert "forty."

Mr. LOUD. Now, if I can have the attention of the House, I will state that the intent of this amendment is simply that we propose to take from this first item, and carry to the second, the sum of $14,000.

Now, after this bill was framed the Department informed us that if we would put a little more money, $14,000, to horse-hire allowance, that they could retrench expenses; that is, if they could get horses for use in the collection, and give them to the carriers, that they could benefit the service without any increased amount, and they asked us to simply transfer that amount to the next item, and that is what we intended to do. It is simply a transfer from one item to another.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I think that is as far as we have gone.

Mr. LOUD. We have another amendment to offer.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not care to detain the committee any length of time, and I am under renewed obligation for my friend's lecture, and also for my friend from California, to whom the chairman of the committee has also paid his attention.

Mr. LOUD. I owe you several yet.

Mr. PICKLER. My friend from California informs me that he owes me several yet. I hope he will not pay the debt. I do not really appreciate all that he says in that line; but, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend, if I can help it, that the gentleman, by a little ridicule and throwing in propositions before the committee that I am trying to pose in behalf of some special people, to allow him to escape the odium that this bill heaps upon himself in regard to the fourth-class postmasters and rural deliveries in this country. The gentleman says we have struck oil. He says that this is part of the continual talk about these fourth-class postmasters, and he is tired of it. Well, he will hear more of it. That is what we intend. The gentleman talks like this is the first time that I had stood up here asking something more for the fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. PICKLER. You talk like that. You said the elections and nominations were coming on pretty soon.

Mr. LOUD. But we have had so many elections.

Mr. PICKLER. I did not interrupt you.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to be interrupted.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, the gentleman has been advising me in a low voice to possess my soul in patience. I hope he will do the same. [Laughter.]

I do not intend that the gentleman shall escape the odium that the bill heaps upon himself. I have no criticism of the gentleman; I have no criticism of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads further than their bill criticises them. That is what I complain of. Now, you can not throw me off the track with these little pieces of ridicule, at which the gentleman is an adept. I am proud that I do try to stand up for the rights of my people. We have no cities where bicycles and all that sort of thing are furnished in my State; and what I am talking for is that my people should have such facilities and accommodations given them as can be given to them reasonably. There is one thing, Mr. Chairman, among many other things, I would not be charged with doing. There is one thing I want to avoid and intend to avoid if possible, and that is that I could be charged by my constituents with sitting still and seeing their rights trampled upon and never entering a protest. I intend to stand up for my people's rights whenever and wherever their rights are involved, whether in this committee or in this House. And the gentleman's ridicule and his unreasonable obstinacy against any allowance for mail facilities to people in the country districts will not deter me.

Now, the complaint I made the other day, that seems to have stirred the gentleman, was in regard to these fourth-class postmasters. I want to say to the gentleman and to this committee that whatever I may say now, and whatever objection I may have to this bill now or in the future, or to other parts of it, is simply to emphasize the inequalities of this bill and to emphasize the fact that this Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, year by year, as I have said here before, has disregarded the interests of the rural districts and of these fourth-class postmasters, treating them as if they have no being whatever. Year after year, as the gentleman from California knows, in this bill they have introduced new schemes and new appliances, electric cars, bicycles, and all that kind of thing, for the people living in the cities, but nothing for the country. That is what I charge you with; that you neglect, disregard, and trample upon the rights of my constituents, because you say you are in the line of economy; and every year you come in here with some new accommodation for the people who are crowded in the different large cities. If anything has been emphasized in this House in the past few years it is the great necessity of trying to keep such aggregations of people out of the cities and persuading them to go the country and engage in rural pursuits, engage in agriculture; and it seems to me that the gentleman ought to think something even about that proposition, because it is conceded by all that one of the dangers of the hour is this great aggregation in the large cities and the people leaving the agricultural districts and deserting the country to go to the cities.

Now, the gentleman talks about my wanting to run my hand into the Treasury and pay officeholders. The men that I am contending for are the men out in the rural districts, in the back districts, where the salary is not $50, probably, a year, and sometimes $25; and if anybody wants a letter to go in or a letter to go out, the postmaster must go to his little store, or remain at his home if the office is there kept, and attend to the patrons of the office.

He must be there at 7 o'clock, at 8 o'clock, and at 9 o'clock, and at 10 o'clock in the morning, and at dinner time, and he must be there until 9 o'clock at night, and he gets nothing for it.

The gentleman from California does not see any injustice in that, but thinks it is a terrible thing for me to want to pay reasonably that poor fourth-class postmaster, who must be at his office more continuously than any city postmaster; who must make out the same kind of reports; who is held to the same responsibilities; who incurs the same penalties if he violates the law as the postmaster in any large city. I contend that it is unfair; that it is unjust to treat those men in this way. I have been contending so for years, even when it was not a Congressional year. [Laughter.] And I have not been alone in that contention; I have been seconded, I think, always by a majority of the House. All that I ask of the gentleman in charge of this bill now, all that the gentlemen from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE and Mr. MCRAE] asked the other day, all that any of us ask of the gentlemen in regard to this matter, is to agree to submit it to a vote. Take the voice of this Committee of the Whole as to whether these fourth-class postmasters ought not to receive more than they are now receiving. But the gentleman stands here and makes his points of order at every step that we try to take to help these men, and it is to emphasize that fact, to emphasize this unfairness to the country districts, that I am making my objections to this bill. My purpose is to emphasize the inequalities and injustices of the bill——

Mr. PICKLER. I would like a little more time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BINGHAM. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. PICKLER. About five minutes more.

By unanimous consent, Mr. PICKLER's time was extended five minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in this proposition of mine for another reason even more than because it will benefit the postmasters. Out in my country oftentimes you can not get a man to serve as postmaster because there is no pay for it, and he is unwilling to do the work and incur the responsibility for nothing, and I do not blame him. But the consequence is that the little post-offices there are so far apart that the people sometimes have to go from 10 to 15 miles for their mails, and that, too, in the winter time, when they have to travel through all kinds of weather and incur all kinds of hardship and lose a great deal of time, and all this because we can not have more post-offices near them—because postmasters do not want to serve—as we would have if the postmasters could be paid for the labors and responsibilities they would have to incur.

Now, that is not fair. It is not fair to my people to compel them to travel such distances for their mails. It is not fair to the people of the sparsely settled portions of the country.

I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill about the number of deliveries in the cities, and I think he is purposely ignorant this afternoon as to the number of deliveries in his own city. We all know, however, that there are five or six or seven deliveries a day in the cities, the mail brought to the doors and deposited in the boxes. That is the kind of service that this Government is giving to the people in the cities, while the people in my country and many other portions of this country must go from 10 to 15 miles for their mails, and the consequence is that if they get mail once a week or every ten days they are doing pretty well. That is what I am complaining of. That is where the injustice and the wrong come in. That is the unfairness of these post-office appropriation bills, continually making increasing appropriations for the extension of the service and for new appliances for mail delivery in cities, while in the country districts the people are placed at such a disadvantage. That is what I am complaining of now, and I propose to reiterate the complaint and to do everything I can to emphasize it as far as I can. I do not do this in any factious spirit. I do not want to delay the deliberations of this body, but I dwell upon this subject because I am in earnest about it, because I intend to try to emphasize it so that some time in the sweet by and by the country districts will have some attention from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, so that some time the members of that committee will come to understand that there are other people who should have mail accommodations besides those who live in the great cities.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir; for a question.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who are unfortunate enough——

Mr. PICKLER. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask a question.

Mr. SPERRY. Then, I do want to put this question: I hear you constantly making a discrimination between the large cities and the small towns and the country.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. SPERRY. Now, let me say to you, my dear friend, that in the free-delivery system, where a 2-cent postage stamp is used on the local routes, the Government receives a surplus from that free delivery in those places in which it exists——

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, that is the same speech the gentleman made on Saturday. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPERRY. Why do you seek to draw a line between the people of the cities and the people of the country towns? I will go as far as you will——

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, no; you will not. You are on this committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPERRY. I will go as far as you will to help the people in the country——

Mr. PICKLER. No; you will not go any distance at all. You have not in this bill where you had the opportunity. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I want a little more time. I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know from the gentleman from South Dakota how many Congresses he has been here?

Mr. PICKLER. Look at the Congressional Directory, my friend, and you will readily find out.

Mr. OGDEN. How many bills have you introduced to remedy this evil?

Mr. PICKLER. You have bills before the committee; why do you not report them? Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain that motion.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires, he can ask unanimous consent for more time. The Chair will recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. PICKLER. Can not I offer another amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. It is a strange thing if, when I yield for a question, I am to be taken off the floor this way. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes additional.

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, let me say to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. SPERRY], a member of this committee, and who now promises so much that I would like him—not in my time—to answer the question whether he will go around to the chairman of this committee and get him to accept something, some amendment, for the benefit of the fourth-class postmasters. We have failed ignominiously in all our attempts with him. As the gentleman tells us of what he is going to do, let him now do something.

Mr. SPERRY rose.

Mr. PICKLER. No, I do not yield to the gentleman now. He has put to me the same question to-day that he put to some gentleman here on Saturday afternoon. He brings up that old matter of drop letters in the city post-offices. Sir, who makes it possible for you to have cities? Who makes it possible for you to have these postal accommodations in your cities? Who makes it possible for you to put in your drop letters? Who makes it possible for you to have your cities of 100,000 people and 500,000 people? It is the people who live in the country who are subjected to all these discomforts. It is upon their labor that you live, and by it you are enabled to have your cities; yet their interests are made tributary to those of the cities which they help to build up.

I want the gentleman to understand that the post-office business of the cities is not to be segregated from the business of the country. This great post-office system is for the whole people—for the cities as well as the country. Because the cities have received from Congress advantages which have not been granted to the country, it must not be forgotten that these cities have grown up at the expense of the people of the country—that my constituents and the constituents of other gentlemen from rural districts have contributed their share of these advantages for the cities. Yet the constituents of gentlemen coming from these cities are not willing to reciprocate by granting any advantages to the constituents of gentlemen who come from the rural districts. That is just the difference. The people of the country have contributed in taxes for all these accommodations and appliances for the benefit of the cities; but under the reports of your Post-Office Committees the people of the cities are not willing to grant anything in return to the people in the country. That is the answer to the gentleman's question; that is the reason I am persistently in earnest about this matter. We do not ask any great advance in behalf of the country districts; but it is time that this committee and this Congress should do something for the rural districts. That is what I am seeking to emphasize.

Mr. SPERRY. And I am with you.

Mr. PICKLER. My friend says that he is with me, but he is not with me to the extent of a dollar in the bill. Why did he not do something for us in the bill?

Mr. SPERRY. We have got a bill——

Mr. PICKLER. You have a bill, but you may be pretty sure that bill will never come before the House for action. The time to get cakes is when the cakes are passing around. The time for us to get something for these fourth-class postmasters is when the city districts are getting their electric-car service, their bicycle service, etc. Why did not the gentleman do something for us when the committee was putting on the provision for these electric cars? As I said the other day, those cars look very nice, they are things of beauty; I do not know how much advantage they are. I am not here to talk against anything in the shape of progress or advancement in the cities. But I am seeking to call attention to this fact, that while you are making advances in behalf of the cities you should make some for the country. I do not believe that all these advances for the benefit of the cities should be made at the expense of the country districts.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, allow me to say to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] that the question of compensation of postmasters was with great care and after mature deliberation adjusted in 1883 when the 2-cent postage rate went into effect. The prior law, basing compensation upon the cancellation of stamps, etc., made it necessary when the 2-cent rate of postage took effect that there should be a change in the adjustment of the compensation of postmasters. Those of the first, second, and third classes were adjusted upon the gross receipts of their offices. The compensation of the class of postmasters to which the gentleman now refers (and this shows the care with which the law was drafted) was based upon the cancellation of stamps, postal cards, stamped envelopes, official stamps, box rents, etc. I want the gentleman to understand what compensation postmasters of this class receive. On the first $50 or less per quarter, 100 per cent. The postmaster receives the whole of the first $50 for each quarter.

Mr. PICKLER. But suppose the business does not come to the office?

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, of course, he does not receive compensation upon it. On the next $100 or less the postmaster receives 60 per cent for each quarter. On the next $200 or less per quarter, 50 cer cent; and on all the balance 40 per cent. When the Auditor for the Post-Office Department adjusts his accounts and they show an excess of $250 for the four quarters of the year, your fourth-class postmaster goes at once in the third class. This was done after a careful and critical consideration by the committee and consultation with the Department, and there has been a general acceptance and acquiescence on the part of the people of the whole country as to the wisdom of the legislation.

Mr. PICKLER. When was this done?

Mr. BINGHAM. In 1883.

Now, in reference to the segregation or division of the paragraphs of the pending bill, that, let me say to the gentleman from South Dakota, is done with the purpose of securing a better administration as to the adjustment of the accounts and expenditures of the money of the Department. Under the one item for letter carriers, for which there is appropriated upward of $12,000,000, the Post-Office Department does pay to-day, and has been for twenty years past paying, for the car fare, horse hire, and similar expenses of the carrier; and the only new incident to it is that incident which is new to us all, the use of the bicycle for purposes of expedition. I have no doubt to-day that the Post-Office Department pays for the use of bicycles for that service. They can pay for it out of the general fund.

Why, twenty-seven years ago I remember when, under my administration of the post-office in the city of Philadelphia, for the first time in the history of the Department, in order to make quick intercourse between the stations of that great city, car fare for the carriers was allowed. In the present instance the committee has done this in the appropriation here for the better administration of the accounts of the Department, while closely holding to the general appropriations.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will allow me to make a suggestion to him, if it does not interfere with the line of argument he is pursuing, all of the money—the millions of profit the Post-Office Department receives—comes from the great cities.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am just coming to that in a moment, and was about to call the attention of the gentleman from South Dakota to the fact.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the fourth-class post-office, let me say a word to the gentleman. There are about 3,500, I think, of the first, second, and third class offices. There are a little exceeding 70,000 post-offices in all throughout the country, and therefore some 66,500 of them are fourth class. From the first, second, and third class offices upward of $60,000,000 of revenue comes. Seventy-eight and some odd per cent of the entire revenue of the postal service comes from these offices, and of necessity you are improving and must improve them.

The gentleman speaks of going to the post-office for the mail. He seems to think the people ought to be required to do that. Does he think it possible for the people of the great cities of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and other large communities to go to the post-offices for their mails? Why, you could not build on a quarter section a house big enough for a post-office in either of these cities that would accommodate the people under such conditions.

Now, as to the free-delivery service, let me tell him this: That system applies to all cities having a population of 10,000 people or upward, or where the gross revenues of the office amount to $10,000 a year. They number a little over 600. The profits of the free-delivery offices to the Government—I have not the exact figures here—but they run from one to two and upward of two million dollars a year. But what do the free-delivery offices do? Let me tell him.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will have additional time. I ask that he have five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, what do the free-delivery offices do? They pay a profit to the Government on what is called local postage; that is, the commingling and intercourse of letter communication within the limits of the free delivery. It costs as much to deliver a letter in my city a distance of two squares as the Government charges to carry it from Maine to California. These carriers and that service pay this enormous revenue to the Government. But what else? It pays all of this and takes every letter and paper that comes from all sections of the country into the great cities and delivers these letters to the homes and business places of the people without the charge of a fraction of a cent additional. Free-delivery offices for this service pay their own expenses and do all of this additional work.

The whole drift and current of postal administration, the whole force of your enactment that requires railroads to carry the mails on their fastest trains, the whole tendency is in the direction of expedition. You have even gone into what you call your 10-cent expedition stamp, your special-delivery stamp, because the people of the country want expedition, quick delivery. That is the purpose of bicycling, of horse renting and horse purchasing, of every expedient that will deliver letters more quickly than in the general routine way.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not complaining about anything of that kind.

Mr. BINGHAM. I grant the gentleman is not complaining.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman was on this committee a long time. I do not know whether he did anything any more than this committee does now——

Mr. BINGHAM. When I was on this committee we gave to every member representing fourth-class offices whatever was desired.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman's argument is in favor of greater facilities in the cities. What is being done there is all the stronger reason why we should have some facilities in the country.

Mr. BINGHAM. You do not ask for further facilities.

Mr. PICKLER. I know what you are doing in the cities. What are you doing for us in the country?

Mr. BINGHAM. We give you facilities in fast mail trains and a greater number of daily mails.

Mr. PICKLER. You give us nothing.

Mr. BINGHAM. We give you facilities in fast mail trains and a large number of mail deliveries. The gentleman is asking for a larger compensation for postmasters; that is not a mail facility.

Mr. PICKLER. I suggest to the gentleman that if you will give to the postmasters some little respectable stipend we can have a great many more post-offices in the sparsely settled country, which will save our people miles of travel; whereas we can not get them now.

Mr. BINGHAM. You have the right to make an application for a post-office every 2 miles.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, I have instituted more such new post-offices than the gentleman has, I think.

Mr. BINGHAM. You do not want any more liberal provision than for a post-office every 2 miles; and if you can show that the business exists for such an office you can get it.

Mr. PICKLER. You can not get men to serve. They do not want to assume the responsibility for so small salaries.

Mr. BINGHAM. I can not help that. If you do not have the mail to be carried you do not deserve any more post-offices.

Mr. PICKLER. What I am saying is that the Post-Office Committee do not try to help us.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know where the gentleman wants any more help.

Mr. PICKLER. You have been planning facilities in the cities. What I complain of is that the country is getting no facilities.

Mr. BINGHAM. I want to tell the gentleman with reference to this horse-hire matter—because it is very important to the people in the cities—that since they have established the package boxes, these large boxes at the street corners for the reception of packages, it has become a physical impossibility for the carriers or collectors to make collections on foot of the mail on their routes. In lieu of that they have little one-horse wagons which make the tour of the city very frequently, both day and night. Therefore, there is an absolute necessity for that character of conveyance from the boxes to the city post-office.

Mr. PICKLER. I think that is a good thing.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Department recognizes every improvement that comes along, recognizes it in the sense that it is a greater benefit and a larger convenience to the people, and I merely want to say to the gentleman from South Dakota that every convenience you give to the people in the great cities is of benefit to himself and his constituents, and every expedition you give to the mails from his section is a benefit to all the people.

The gentleman is mistaken in supposing that there has not been a fair consideration in the allowances made to postmasters of the fourth class. I will say to the gentleman that no more critical or careful adjustment, with a due regard for the labor performed by fourth-class postmasters, was given to any paragraph than to that paragraph of the bill of 1883, which I helped to frame and which is now law. I was a member of the committee at the time, and I remember with great distinctness the care which we bestowed upon that piece of legislation, and how generously and acceptably it was received by the House.

Mr. PICKLER. Can the gentleman tell us in how many post-offices in the United States the salary of the postmaster is less than $50 a year?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know. I can not tell that.

Mr. PICKLER. Can the chairman of the committee tell that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in at lines 24 and 25.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not reached that paragraph yet.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 21 insert "For marine free-delivery service, $3,500."

Mr. LOUD. I will state to the committee that in this segregation the Department did not take into consideration the marine free-delivery service which is now in operation at Detroit, and under this segregation it was held that they probably would not be allowed to continue this service without a special item of appropriation. The people of the Northwest, of course, understand what this means. There has been a free-delivery service established at Detroit to supply the great mass of vessels passing through the Detroit River up into the lakes. It has grown to be a great accommodation, and I think it should be continued.

The amendment of Mr. LOUD was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For horse-hire allowance, $330,000.

Mr. LOUD. I have an amendment to offer there, which takes the money we took out of the pay of carriers and puts it into the horse-hire item. It simply replaces what we took out.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22 strike out "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof "forty-four."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUD. Now, I ask that the item of car-fare and bicycle allowance may be passed over temporarily, until we have passed over that portion of the bill relating to electric-car service.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the item for car-fare and bicycle allowances be passed over temporarily. Is there objection?

Mr. BELKNAP. I have a proposition to offer concerning that, at the proper time.

Mr. PICKLER. The right to make points of order will be considered as reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to reserve a point of order?

Mr. PICKLER. Not until we reach the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota desire to reserve a point of order against the paragraph?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; I will reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota desires to have a point of order pending against the paragraph. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TALBERT. I will ask permission that the Clerk read an amendment which I have sent up, so that it can be printed in the RECORD and pending when we come back to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] asks to have the amendment which he has sent up read for information. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of lines 24 and 25 and insert in lieu thereof "For fourth-class mail service in carrying mail, $100,000."

Mr. LOUD. Is that read for information?

The CHAIRMAN. That is read for information.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the Clerk read it again. We did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

The amendment was again read.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire that it may be pending when we return to the paragraph.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

In all, $12,744,750.

Mr. LOUD. I wish to offer an amendment simply to make the total of that item correspond with the change that has been made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 12 and 13, strike out "$44,750" and insert "$48,250."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Ninth. For stationery in post-offices, $50,000.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I offer an amendment to this sixteenth clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 3, page 4, by striking out, after the word "machines," the word "forty," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixty"; so as to read "sixty thousand dollars."

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads stated a few days ago, in answer to my question, that the reasons given for the reduction of the appropriation as recommended by the Post-Office Department from $60,000 down to $40,000 were stated in the report of the committee; and he referred us to the statements made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General and his report as the foundation for the conclusion to which the committee came.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the reduction of this appropriation from $60,000 down to $40,000 will fall most heavily upon the large cities, like that of Chicago, whose rapid delivery depends upon the rapid cancellation of the stamps and the marking of the letters before they are sent out. I submit further, Mr. Chairman, that the report and the remarks made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General carry no such conclusion as the chairman has stated to be derived therefrom. The remarks and the statement made by the Assistant Postmaster-General show that business principles of the highest order have been exercised in making up the estimate for this appropriation. The chairman stated that a reading of the face of the report itself will show that good business methods have not been adopted. On the contrary, I submit to this House that the best business methods are there exhibited.

The substance of the First Assistant Postmaster-General's report shows the following facts: The appropriation for canceling machines for the year ending June 30, 1896, is $60,000. This was excessive, but unavoidably so. The contract for 100 Hey & Dolphin machines at $400 each expired June 30, 1895. That contract was dropped and 100 Barry machines were substituted, at $150 each—a saving on the 100 machines of $25,000. The cost of those substituted for the 100 machines is $15,000. In addition to the Barry machines there are in use 134 machines of the Postal Machine Company, at $200 each—a total cost of $26,800. Additional machines arranged for will cost not to exceed a total of $18,200 for 91 machines, at $200 each. The total cost of 325 machines to be in use as against 213 machines in use for the present fiscal year, $60,000.

Mr. PICKLER. Is that rental or purchase of machines?

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. That is for the rental of the machines. They are patented machines. They do an enormous amount of work in a very short space of time. And I will say to the gentleman that in the city of Chicago, which handled 700,000,000 pieces of mail matter last year, much of this mail matter comes in at such an hour of the day that to dispatch the mail so that it may get out on the trains and into the city it can not be done except with the use of these machines.

To deny this appropriation of $60,000 and to reduce the same to $40,000, as provided in the pending bill, will not only prevent the continued use of the 234 machines, but will prevent the addition of the 91 machines as now needed. Requisitions have been made throughout the country for 107 additional machines, although the appropriation, as recommended by the Department, only contemplates and will allow an increase of 91 machines. In other words, an increase of 112 machines can be made without increasing the amount of the appropriation of last year for that purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee any further, but I would like to call their attention to the enormous business which is transacted in the city of Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I would like to have about three min utes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. The Chicago post-office is the distributing center of one-seventeenth of the total inhabitants of all the States of the United States. It is the postal center of nearly 5,000,000 people; it contributes one-fifteenth of the postal revenue of the United States; its total receipts are about $5,000,000; showing an increase of 235 per cent within the last ten years. It contributes to the Government as much as do the cities of St. Louis, Cincinnati, San Francisco, Brooklyn, and Pittsburg together. New York covers 40 square miles and Chicago covers 125 square miles of territory by carriers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the enormous business thus transacted at that enormous postal center, it seems to me that the committee is quite in error in making such a reduction in this item for the canceling machines as will cause not only a reduction of 15 per cent of the number of machines which can there be used, but will also deprive them of the necessary increase which is so much needed in order to do the business in the office. I hope the chairman of the committee, in view of these facts, and in view of the statement made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, can see his way to let this amendment be adopted.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the House long. I think the older members of the House will know the position I have always taken in regard to these canceling machines. I have consistently stood on the floor here and fought against the striking out of this appropriation. I believe it is a service that will eventually become a great assistance to the Post-Office Department. We carried $60,000 in the bill of last year, I know, but that was on the basis of 100 of these machines—I do not remember the name, but I think Hey & Dolphin—and I think there was some other machine, what is known as the Postal machine.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I think the chairman of the committee understands the fact that they are reducing the cost of these machines every year. They are coming down in price.

Mr. LOUD. Now, as to this policy of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, about these rapid canceling machines, which would cancel 25,000 or 30,000 an hour, he supplemented them with other machines. Now, I am willing so far as I can, as a member of Congress, to encourage this industry of canceling machines, but it is simply a trial so far.

There is no post-office in this country that can afford to reduce the number of clerks it employs by reason of having the machines, because no one can tell what hour they are going to get out of order. They can not be depended upon. I am willing to encourage this industry to a reasonable extent, and I am satisfied that the time will come when we shall have a perfect machine. What machine it may be, I do not care. The other day I stated that these machines were concentrated in a few offices. As a matter of fact, in Boston there are more than 40; in the main office there are more than 40; and in New York City there are 29. Probably it requires 40 machines in Boston to do the work, because they get out of order; but if the machine had reached such a state of perfection that it could be depended upon and clerks could be discharged, I assume that five machines would probably perform all the work of the Boston office.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know much about the state of the industry that the gentleman speaks of, but I do recollect spending parts of two days in the Chicago post-office and seeing these machines at work, not on dress parade, and it seemed to me from the amount of work they were doing that if you could keep even two of them in working order their work would more than compensate for the rent of them all. It seems to me, therefore, that if the machines are as imperfect as the gentleman thinks, then there ought to be more rather than less money appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, let me say that $40,000 will carry 200 machines, and I think that is enough to have on trial. I assume that if these machines were properly distributed—if they were distributed among the cities of two or three hundred thousand inhabitants each—there would be as many machines as they could take care of, and we would be encouraging this industry to advantage. I do not think they have as many machines in the Chicago office as they have in Boston.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. There are 40 in Chicago.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Chicago is a city three or four times the size of Boston, and that shows that these machines are not distributed around uniformly. I think 200 of them is a sufficient number for us to have on trial.

Mr. CANNON. Forty machines in Chicago, with how many pieces of mail matter?

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Seven hundred million pieces of mail matter per annum.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the number of pieces the office handles, but this machine touches only letters and circulars.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that with $25,000 increase in this item the gentleman could not have any embarrassment in these great offices.

Mr. LOUD. This item as it stands will not embarrass any office that has the machines now. It will not embarrass Chicago.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I talked two or three days ago with the postmaster at Chicago, who is a pretty careful man, and he told me that if we made a reduction when there ought to be an increase, it would not only embarrass, but would greatly injure the service at that point.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think it will. I think it will maintain the machines now in use, substantially at least. One kind of machine that they are now paying for they are not using, because it is practically useless.

Mr. BINGHAM. How much do you pay under this bill for machines by way of rent?

Mr. LOUD. They are paying $200 for one and $150 per annum for the other. I think the allowance carried in the bill is sufficient for this purpose. If I had not thought so, I should not have agreed to cut it down, but I am not very particular about it.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. The chairman of the committee recognizes the fact that the report made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General shows a large decrease in the cost of the several machines.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes, and he assumes that one machine is as good as the other, but it is not.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Without increasing the appropriation beyond the $60,000 that the bill of last year carried, there may be in use this year 325 machines, as against 213 in use last year.

Mr. LOUD. I understand; but the machines are not distributed. In my own city they had machines under the old contract, but they have none under the present contract. There has been no distribution. The machines are concentrated.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I hope the gentleman does not disapprove the recommendation of the Postmaster-General simply because he thinks he has made an unfair distribution of machines.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee will not object to this amendment for this reason: I called upon the First Assistant Postmaster-General one day last week, and he informed me that if the appropriation stands as it is in the bill, at $40,000, he will be compelled to take at least 20 machines out of the Chicago post-office, and at the same time he stated that if 20 machines were taken out of that office then, in order to do the work that is done there after 4 o'clock in the afternoon and to do it as rapidly as is done by the machines, it would be necessary to appoint at least 50 men. Now, I do not advocate this amendment solely in the interest of Chicago, because the mail that is taken to and from the Chicago post-office is not to any considerable degree delivered within the city limits. Chicago is only, as my colleague [Mr. COOKE] has stated, a distributing point for at least 5,000,000 of people. I have in my hand a report of the postmaster at Chicago, Mr. Washington Hesing, in which he gives a statement of the workings of that office for six days:

Letters and postal cards originating in Chicago for delivery in Chicago	1,220,652
Newspapers, circulars, and packages originating in Chicago for delivery in Chicago	459,306

Carrying out this statement for the balance of the week upon mails received at and delivered from the post-office at Chicago for points outside of the city, the aggregate is 12,246,564 pieces, of which just a little over one in ten are delivered in the limits of the city.

Now, the great bulk of the mail received at that post-office is collected after 3 o'clock in the afternoon and delivered at the post-office between 3 and 6 o'clock. You may go into that office between 8 o'clock a. m. and 3 o'clock p. m., and you will find probably a dozen or fifteen of the machines lying idle; but from 3 o'clock until after 7 o'clock every one of the 40 machines in that office is working constantly. In that way the stamps on every piece of mail taken into the office are canceled, so that the mail is placed in bags and put on the cars before 10 o'clock in the evening.

Now, if you take out 20 of those machines it will be impossible to get more than one-half of the mail deposited in that office carried out by the 10 o'clock trains of the same night, and almost all the trains carrying mail from Chicago leave on or about 10 o'clock in the evening. The remainder of the mail not going out by those 10 o'clock trains will be held over for the mail trains leaving the next morning between 10 and 11 o'clock.

Mr. LOUD. I think I can compromise this matter with the gentleman. I am willing to accept an amendment increasing this amount to $45,000, which will cover 225 machines and will not disturb any condition now in existence. Personally, I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. LORIMER. Five thousand dollars, I will say to the gentleman, would of course take care very nicely of the city of Chicago.

Mr. LOUD. And permit me to repeat, it would not disturb any existing condition. It would provide 225 machines. Let me say to the gentleman that although rent is being paid on these machines, they are not to any extent in use.

Mr. BINGHAM. The statement of the First Assistant Postmaster-General has been cited here to the effect that carrying this appropriation at $40,000 instead of $60,000, as asked by the Department, would deprive Chicago of 20 machines, and would require for doing the work 50 additional persons in the subordinate force. Now, if this reduction operates upon the Chicago office, it operates upon the offices of all the large cities of the country where the machine is used. I wish to ask the gentleman from California whether, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. LORIMER], he has considered the additional clerical force that would be required if this appropriation should be made in the sum of $40,000. That is a matter of very great significance.

Mr. LOUD. A 33 per cent reduction in the appropriation would not, of course, force a 50 per cent reduction in the number of machines. That is perfectly plain. The gentleman ought to be aware of the fact, and I presume he is, that there is no allowance made in the post-offices to-day for reduction of force by reason of the use of these machines, because they can not be depended upon. Take, as an illustration, my own city. The two machines which were introduced there (and permit me to say two were sufficient for the city of San Francisco) were taken out and six clerks were immediately appointed to do the work which the machines had been expected to do, and those clerks remain there. They will remain. That condition has been existing throughout the whole country. I am satisfied that an appropriation of $45,000 will disturb no existing condition. If I thought it would, I would not recommend it.

Mr. LORIMER. I have simply the statement of the First Assistant Postmaster-General——

Mr. LOUD. Well, he is mistaken.

Mr. LORIMER. Who said that if the whole 40 machines should be taken out it would necessitate the employment of at least 100 more clerks to do the work. Calculating upon that basis, if 20 machines should be taken out the employment of 50 additional clerks would be necessary.

Mr. LOUD. I can guarantee the gentleman that under the $45,000 appropriation his office will not lose a machine that is in use to-day. Is my proposition acceptable to the gentleman?

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. It would not be acceptable to us for the reasons already stated. The chairman of the committee has not met the arguments or the facts which have been advanced here. It is clear that this reduced appropriation would result in the reduction of the number of machines in use in the Chicago office. And it would be obviously unfair to the other large cities of the country which are also distributing points if the entire amount of the addition which the gentleman's concession proposes should go for the benefit of the single city of Chicago.

We would not wish to be placed in that position. And with regard to the statement of the gentleman that he would practically guarantee that it would not result in a reduction there, I would only say that while he is the chairman of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House he is not the Postmaster-General. He may perhaps become so a little later on, but he does not now hold the office.

Mr. BELKNAP. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with my colleagues on this question. All we want is the number of machines we have now in use. We do not ask anything more. We do not want to take any away from any other place——

Mr. LOUD. I have just stated that this would give 225 machines, every machine in use to-day.

Mr. LORIMER. I only wish to state for the benefit of the chairman of the committee that the Postmaster-General says that if the appropriation remains as now he proposes to distribute the machines about the country in such a way as to take from Chicago twenty.

Mr. LOUD. Then we must assume, I suppose, that if we give him the $60,000 he will keep them just as they are.

Mr. LORIMER. We assume, if we give him $60,000, that the number of machines we have in Chicago—and this is on his statement—will remain there, and the balance of the appropriation will be used to hire machines in places where he would send the machines under this arrangement.

Mr. LOUD. Will you accept $50,000?

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. It would not be sufficient.

Mr. LOUD. Well, then, let us have a vote.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. COOKE of Illinois, and it was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, page 4, after the word "rental," insert the words "or purchase"; so as to read: "for rental or purchase of canceling machines," etc.

Mr. LACEY. The same amendment, I will say to the gentleman from California, was in the last appropriation bill, authorizing the purchase as well as rental.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will allow this to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. LACEY. Very well. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ODELL, for five days.

To Mr. FENTON, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1699)——

Mr. LOUD. What about the motion to adjourn?

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 10, 1896.

Prayer by Rev. WALLACE RADCLIFFE, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I saw in the New York newspapers of Sunday an interview attributed to the Spanish minister. There was nothing in that circumstance particularly remarkable, as the Spanish minister communicates very largely through the newspapers with the people of the United States. But in this interview he took occasion to criticise words uttered in debate in the United States Senate, and the portion which relates to me and on which alone I propose to touch I ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Secretary to read the headline which I have marked and the short paragraph which I have marked below.

The Secretary read as follows:

DE LÔME ON THE SENATORS.

HE CHARACTERIZES THEIR ARRAIGNMENT OF SPAIN AS MOST UNJUST—WOULD SHOW SENATORS SHERMAN AND LODGE TO BE UTTERLY IN ERROR—NO FOUNDATION FOR GENERAL WEYLER'S ALLEGED CRUELTY.

* * * * * * *

In Senator LODGE'S speech there was a translation from a Spanish paper giving an interview with Weyler on leaving Cadiz to take command in Cuba, regarding his intention to pursue a policy of extermination. Señor de Lôme says he had all the papers, and is prepared to demonstrate to Senator LODGE that some one has imposed upon him a maliciously fraudulent report. In fact, in the minister's opinion, that is where most of the trouble lies.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it will be observed in the sentence that has been read that I am accused of having read to the Senate a report which the Spanish minister could not find, he says, in any Spanish newspaper. He says he had them all and that I had imposed upon me a malicious and fraudulent misrepresentation.

I hold in my hand the cutting from El Liberal, of Madrid, from which the interview was taken. It states at the head of the first column that it is the newspaper having the largest circulation in Spain. How true that may be I do not know. I know as a matter of fact that it is a widely circulated newspaper in Madrid. The interview is here in the original Spanish. I will have it printed in the RECORD, and Senators who are better Spanish scholars than I can pretend to be can compare it with the translation which I printed the other day and see whether that translation is not substantially correct.

WEYLER Á CUBA.

[Por telegrafo Cadiz, 28 (6.35 t.).]

El general Weyler recibió á las autoridades en el suntuoso despacho dispuesto á bordo del trasatlántico.

Se encontraba despachando multitud de cartas y telegramas.

La misma operación le habia tenido en vela hasta las dos de la madrugada.

Está algo afónico, pues se le ha recrudecido el catarro que tenia.

Dijéronle las autoridades:

—Venimos á darle el último adiós.

—El último . . . en la presente temporada—contestó el general.

Todos hicieron votos por la pronta terminación de la campaña.

PALABRAS DE WEYLER.

—No será fácil—contestó el general—realizar lo que ustedes y todos los españoles deseamos.

Me contentaria con terminarla pasados dos años.

En la guerra anterior, que tuvo menos importancia, se invirtieron diez anos.

Voy en pésimas condiciones.

Después de los refuerzos que se enviarán en Febrero, es imposible enviar nuevas fuerzas hasta el invierno próximo, como no fuera movilizando las reservas.

También se necesita mucho dinero, y el pais está haciendo ya los últimos sacrificios.

La cuestión necesita un especial estudio, con objeto de no gravar más los intereses públicos.

Me anima la reacción que se opera en la opinión y la actitud de las familias cubanas que marchan a Tampa, al solo anuncio de mi marcha á la isla.

Supongo que algún motivo tienen, cuando huyen.

Ansio verme en Cuba, porque me pesa, como á los fanáticos religiosos, cuanto pesa sobre mi cargo.

No descanso hasta cumplirlo satisfactoriamente.

Y no temo mi porvenir.

Recuerdo las predicciones que me hicieron antes de ir á Cataluña.

Entonces me dijeron que concluirian conmigo los anarquistas.

Ha sucedido todo lo contrario, pues hasta me capté el cariño de todos. Lo prueba la despedida que me han hecho al salir de Barcelona, la cual me conmovió de tal manera como nunca he sentido.

Al llegar á Cuba me propongo, en primer término, limpiar de filibusteros las provincias de la Habana, Pinar del Rio, Matanzas y Las Villas, entendiéndose que me refiero, por ahora, á las gruesas partidas que las invaden.
Después me quedan las pequeñas partidas de bandidos, que exterminaré paulatinamente.
De todos modos, en las presentes circunstancias se necesita mucha actividad.
Despues le preguntó el capitan del buque si podian zarpar.
—Si—contesto el general Weyler—vamos, y que la fortuna nos acompañe.

I think there can be no doubt of the fact that this interview appeared in a well-known Madrid paper.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of what date?

Mr. LODGE. It is of the 29th of January. I looked over the translation this morning, with a view particularly to one passage which I have seen criticised in the newspapers that I translated one word "exterminate" which did not mean "exterminate." It occurs near the end of General Weyler's interview. He says, "limpiar de filibusteros." "Limpiar" means to clean, or scour, or purify. To "clean out" is what it means—that he was going to "clean out" the filibusters. I used in the translation, perhaps improperly, the word "exterminate." I was led to do so because in the next sentence he refers to the small bands, "que exterminare," about which, I think, there can be no question. He was going to exterminate the small bands and clean out the large ones. But I have submitted the original document to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I can understand the sensitiveness of the Spanish people. A people who have dissipated in the course of three hundred years a great empire naturally feel sensitive over their exploits in so doing. But I do not think that that is any excuse for the diplomatic representative of that nation to adopt the course he has adopted. He was referred to here yesterday, if the debate was correctly reported in the newspapers, as a historical authority. His statements are the ex parte statements of the agent of the Spanish Government; that is all they are. They are entitled to just that much weight; and anyone who has followed his very numerous statements, I think, will agree that they have confused the sum of human information in regard to Cuba perhaps as much as any others.

Mr. President, I think it is a pretty well established custom and a pretty well established fact that the debates in the Senate and the House are domestic matters with which no foreign nation has concern. The proper channel for a diplomatic representative who wishes to make representations on any subject is through the State Department, not through the newspapers. If an American diplomatist were to criticise in a European country the debates in the representative body of that country in the newspapers published in that country he would be sent home, and we all know it. If the ambassador of Turkey had gone into the London papers with an interview denouncing what Lord Rosebery said about Armenia in the House of Lords or what other Englishmen said about Armenia in the House of Commons, do you suppose that it would have passed unrebuked, or that he would have been allowed even to remain in London?

No, Mr. President, we well know what the custom is, and we know that our diplomatists regard it. The able lawyer and distinguished author who now represents the United States in Madrid, you may be very sure, has made no representations through the newspapers as to the relations of the United States and Spain. And yet the report this morning in the dispatches in the New York papers is that Mr. Taylor has sent his wife and family and papers out of Madrid, because he thought it was safer to do so.

Mr. President, I have called attention to this matter because I do not think that there is any propriety in a diplomatic representative discussing what is said in the Senate. We have not been discussing diplomatic negotiations in this Cuban matter. We have been discussing a great question in regard to a war raging close by the boundaries of the United States. We have the right to discuss it with the most entire freedom.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the language used by Mr. Webster when the representative of Austria undertook, in a diplomatic note sent through the proper channels, to find fault with language used in a communication from the President to the Senate in response to a request for documents relating to the question then existing about Hungary. Mr. Webster said:

With respect to the communication of Mr. Mann's instructions to the Senate and the language in which they are couched, it has already been said, and Mr. Hülsemann must feel the justice of the remark, that these are domestic affairs, in reference to which the Government of the United States can not admit the slightest responsibility to the Government of His Imperial Majesty. No State deserving the appellation of independent can permit the language in which it may instruct its own officers in the discharge of their duties to itself to be called in question under any pretext by a foreign power.

Fault has been found with the language used in regard to this Cuban question. One would suppose that it was the first time in the history of the United States that strong language had been used in regard to the struggle of a neighboring people for their freedom. In the case when the Hülsemann letter was written it was simply the sympathy of the United States for the Hungarians and for Louis Kossuth. There is talk about rough language being used now. Let me read the language of Daniel Webster in his reply:

The power of this Republic at the present moment is spread over a region one of the richest and most fertile on the globe, and of an extent in comparison with which the possessions of the House of Hapsburg are but as a patch on the earth's surface. Its population, already 25,000,000, will exceed that of the Austrian Empire within the period during which it may be hoped that Mr. Hülsemann may yet remain in the honorable discharge of his duties to his Government.

That was the language of Mr. Webster in reply to a letter criticising the domestic action of the United States.

Mr. President, I have thought it desirable, as my name was called in question, to show that what I quoted in the Senate stands printed in a Spanish paper as I quoted it, and the charge of the Spanish minister that I introduced a maliciously fraudulent report falls to the ground. Whether the paper had that interview or not I do not know, and neither does the Spanish minister. I quoted it as it was reported, and there it is.

I desire at the same time to enter my protest against having any diplomatic representative using as a channel for communication the newspapers of the United States to criticise language uttered in debate. The Constitution of the United States protects each one of us for the language uttered in debate. It is one of the earliest safeguards of the freedom of the English-speaking race, and I do not think it is proper that such criticisms should be made by a foreign representative accredited to this country. It gives rise to, it renders inevitable just such affairs as this, which ought never to occur. I for one wish to protest against it. I know very well what any other country would do under similar circumstances, and I know very well what many previous Administrations would have done under similar circumstances. I do not think there is any doubt what Daniel Webster would have done if any foreign representative in his time had undertaken to behave as this one has done.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the matter of the adoption of resolutions expressing the sympathy of the two Houses of Congress for the struggling patriots in Cuba should have taken the form of a personal controversy between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Spanish minister. I do not see why we can not pursue the even tenor of our way undisturbed by emeutes in Valencia or Madrid or the excesses of exuberant youthful feeling in the universities of Spain, and accomplish our purpose as a great, strong, dignified, and self-respecting nation should accomplish its purpose, or why we should be led aside to discuss a difference in the interpretation or translation of a word in a Spanish newspaper between the Senator from Massachusetts and the minister from Spain.

Mr. President, I should be as quick as anyone to resent an infringement upon the privileges of a member of this body, but I must say, in all common fairness and in that sense of fair play which ought to find a place in the breast of every American, that it is hardly worth our while to stretch the prerogatives of the Senate and strain the interpretation of its privileges in order to attack a gentleman who has no chance to reply to the strictures that are made upon his conduct.

I do not agree with the minister from Spain. I sympathize with the Cuban cause, as it is called. But that sympathy will be better directed, it will find a wider currency, if we do not attempt to take undue advantage of everyone who has or chooses to express an opinion different from ours, and especially one situated as the minister from Spain is situated in this exceedingly delicate crisis for him in his country's affairs.

Mr. President, as to the criticism upon the propriety of that communication in the newspaper, I do not care to discuss it upon very strict lines of diplomatic usage. I am willing to concede something to the provocation, something to the stress of circumstance in which that gentleman found himself, and not be overcritical or overnice in drawing the lines of diplomatic usage and diplomatic propriety around him. I do not think that it becomes us to find fault with him after what has occurred in the Senate, when he in courteous phrase and in carefully guarded language points out that there may probably have been a mistake in the translation of a Spanish newspaper, or that the history of an outrage attributed to the officers and soldiers of his own country may have been unauthenticated and derived from a source unworthy of credit.

I am not indorsing what the Spanish minister said; I rather prefer to take, perhaps, the statement made in reply to it by the secretary of the Cuban junta in this country, Mr. Quesada; but I want to treat fairly and I want to treat generously an antagonist, if he is to be an antagonist, and not be found here quarreling over point no point in regard to that communication.

The statement read by the Senator from Massachusetts from Mr. Webster's celebrated Hülsemann letter does not apply at all to the case we have in hand. That celebrated letter of Mr. Webster to Baron Hülsemann, who was the Austrian envoy at Washington, had its occasion in a note considered to transgress diplomatic proprieties addressed by Hülsemann to the Secretary of State, finding fault with a statement made in a communication from the President of the United States to the Congress of the United States. That is very different, Mr. President, from a statement made to correct what the Spanish minister thought errors of fact, not to Congress, not to the President, finding fault with no official utterance, not attacking the Senator from Massachusetts, so far as I could understand what was read from the desk, but pointing out in courteous phrase to the public press what he thought was a mistake in fact in regard to history cited by him, charging no intention on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts that was discreditable to him, but calling his attention merely to sources of information which might correct the history that had been cited upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, that was not the case that Mr. Webster was dealing with. That was not an interference on the part of a foreign minister with any of the privileges either of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, nor was it an impertinent interference or a protest addressed to the Executive through any of its Departments. This case differs entirely from what Mr. Webster was dealing with in the celebrated letter to which the Senator from Massachusetts has referred.

If, then, Mr. President, we are to conduct this discussion of the resolutions in which we think proper to express our sentiments in regard to the unfortunate condition of things in the Island of Cuba, I pray that we may not be put in the attitude of unfairly crowding the Spanish minister from any opportunity even to protest against what he considers a statement mistaken in the facts which it attempts to relate. I think that our position will be stronger, that it will be more satisfactory to the American people, if we do not attempt to close the mouth of anyone who is interested upon the other side of this question.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it has been the unbroken rule in diplomatic affairs that the accredited agents of foreign Governments should not interfere with domestic affairs.

Mr. GRAY. That is right.

Mr. TELLER. There should be no comment made by any foreign minister upon the parliamentary proceedings of the country to which he is accredited. Yesterday, when an objection was made, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] seemed to think it was made because of sensitiveness on the part of those who made the objection; that is, that they did not desire to get the facts and the truth. I think I suggested yesterday what the rule is. It is not a question whether the communication is an offensive communication. It might be a laudatory and an approving one. The rule is that the foreign minister must not interfere at all in domestic affairs. He must not be heard except in an official way through the proper department of the Government; that is, the State Department.

It was said yesterday that this is like a matter of history. Mr. President, that is most absurd. If the rule is worth anything that he can not address us directly, neither can he address us through a newspaper. Twice in the history of this country have we sent home the minister of a great country—one of France and one of Great Britain—for a very much less offense than the one the Spanish minister has been guilty of. For fear that some one will say that I am criticising the Administration for not sending him home, I want to say that under the circumstances, considering the friction that has arisen in Spain, if I had been the President of the United States I should not have sent him home, but I should have suggested very kindly to him through the Secretary of State that a repetition of that conduct would necessitate his leaving this country.

This is not a technical rule. It is not one of those things that has grown up without a cause. Yesterday we had a debate as to the facts that this man had stated. You can see now the impropriety, to say nothing further and giving it no harsher term, of bringing the Spanish minister into the debate and raising a question of veracity between him and a member of the body. Its impropriety ought to be so apparent to everyone that that thing ought never to be again repeated in the Senate. Not only that, but we had a communication read here from the prime minister of Spain in utter defiance of every rule that heretofore has governed this body, and rules, I repeat, that are made for the maintenance of peace and order between the nations of the earth.

Mr. President, we can not safely in this body discuss such questions. We ought not to discuss them. There is great reason why we should not discuss them. If I should say of the Spanish minister what I might think (and I do not mean any reflection on him, because I do not know him) it might be very harsh, and might compel on his part a retort, and thus there might spring up an unseemly and indecent controversy. All this comes from not maintaining a well-settled and well-established reasonable rule that if a foreign minister has anything to say to us he must say it officially through the State Department that is provided for communications with him and with his Government.

We have discussed here in the Senate, I admit, some things touching the question of belligerency that need not to have been touched on. It is absolutely immaterial how that war is being carried on. The question is not whether it is being carried on wickedly, savagely, contrary to the laws of nations. When you come to determine the question of the recognition of their belligerency, that has nothing in the world to do with it. The question is what is the fact that exists in Cuba, not how they are carrying on the war. When we come to consider another question, whether there may be such a condition there as to require intervention on our part, then the question how they are carrying on the war becomes a legitimate and proper subject of discussion, and not until then.

Yesterday the debate went off upon the disputed facts. The Senator from Maine challenged the statement that had been made here that the war was carried on contrary to the laws of civilized warfare, as if when it should be established that the Spaniards were carrying on the war according to civilized warfare then the Cubans would not be entitled to belligerent rights. The Senator would not make that statement; he would not found his case upon that, and yet that is where the debate went off yesterday entirely, it being asserted that the Cubans are very wicked on their side, and that the Spaniards are not so wicked as had been asserted.

Mr. President, the only way to deal with these subjects is to deal with them in accordance with the well-established and well-regulated laws that have governed deliberative bodies and have governed international intercourse among nations. That is the only way that it can be done, and not by creating unnecessary frictions and disturbances.

There is a good deal of a row in Spain. The people of Spain are very much excited. Now, that is not to be wondered at, and it is not, in my judgment, a source of grievance that we ought to complain of. We would have a right to complain if the Spanish Government did not take proper means to put it down; but up to the present hour it does seem that the Spanish Government has done everything that any decent Government could do to maintain quiet and peace at home. Therefore that ought not to be brought in, and there ought to be no friction engendered because the students there have been excited any more than because of the action of students, irresponsible people, in burning the Spanish flag here.

If those people have maintained an existence as a nation to a certain extent and war has become flagrant, as we know it has, then they are entitled to certain rights that the civilized countries of the earth recognize, and when we recognize those rights it is no cause of offense to Spain. Spain has no right to complain. She may feel hurt. We felt exceedingly hurt when some foreign powers early recognized the belligerency of the Southern Confederacy. And yet it is not a cause of war. There is no more probability that the Spanish nation as a nation will assert in an offensive way their dislike of our action than that they will declare open war against us, because the Spanish officials know very well that by international law we have a right to recognize a state of war in Cuba and extend to those people belligerent rights. They know more than that. When a war has existed for months, as it has, we have a right to intervene in a friendly way, and they have no right to complain of it.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator, if he will allow me at this point, if there is not another reason, and that is, that they have no right to treat a concurrent resolution as binding or affecting the American people in any way whatever?

Mr. TELLER. The declaration of the Senate of the United States is a declaration that will attract the attention of the world, and I do not suppose——

Mr. HOAR. My proposition is, whether the declaration of the Senate of the United States is not precisely the declaration of an individual Senator, without any force whatever?

Mr. TELLER. I do not suppose those people over there stop to consider that question, and I do not propose to stop to consider it.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody seems to do so.

Mr. TELLER. They have treated it as a declaration of the American people. They had a right to so treat it, whether legally so or not. If they take offense, which they have done, they have a right to take offense, just as we took offense; but they have no right to go to war; they have no right to insult our flag; and I am glad the Spanish nation recognizes its duty to protect the flag which floats over our consulates there from outrage, and is doing that as well as it can do it.

I am an ardent sympathizer with the fight for independence in Cuba, and I should be delighted to hear to-day that Habana is in the hands of the insurgents. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] I should be delighted to know that those people had run the Spanish forces into the sea. But, Mr. President, I have not the slightest feeling against the Spanish Government. I have not the slightest feeling of impatience or hatred because of the conduct of their irresponsible students. I look upon those outbreaks just as I should look upon similar outbreaks if they occurred here.

Spain, a great and powerful nation, once very powerful, is hardly able to recognize the fact that it is not so great as in early days, full of pride, believing that the maintenance of this island is to them absolutely indispensable, and that by its loss she would be greatly disgraced. Nobody can wonder that the Spaniards want to hold that island; nobody can wonder that they are somewhat impatient at our action. On the other hand, here is an island right by our side. We know, no matter what may be said about it, that the people there are struggling to obtain a better government. We know very well that there is reason why they should have a better government. We know very well that there is absolutely no probability that they will ever get it under the Spanish flag. How can it be otherwise than that the American people will sympathize with them in this contest? I am ashamed of any man who does not sympathize with them. I do not say because we sympathize with them that we should do things not proper under international law. I do not say that we should intervene to protect them and to establish their government; but we can not help sympathizing with them; and yet, in sympathizing with them, we should pursue a course which gives no needless offense to the people who are endeavoring to maintain the control of that island. No unnecessary offense should be given to Spain; and I do not myself think in the resolutions which we have passed that there is any occasion for Spain to have anything more than the same identical feeling which we had when Spain recognized the Southern Confederacy; that it was after all an unfriendly act and indicated sympathy with the combatants on the other side; that we did not like to see, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the Cuban question. I rose to enter my protest against bringing into the Senate, contrary to what I understand to be the rules of the body, the sayings and doings of a foreign minister. I rose to enter my protest against a foreign minister, no matter from what nation he comes, taking any part in our affairs, and I say again, no matter who he is, if I were President of the United States, and the offense were repeated, I should give him his walking papers and send him home. I would have it distinctly understood that the American people would submit to no interference, no suggestion, no criticism of a foreign minister accredited to our Government.

Talk about maintaining the dignity of a nation. You can not do it if you allow those things to be done. If they are proper criticisms, if they are justifiable from the facts, that is to say, if we abuse Spain unnecessarily, nevertheless the Spanish minister has no right to complain of us, unless he complains through the State Department. That he has a right to do, and that he is justified in doing.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I wish to speak on this subject before the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which has been replied to with some expressions of dissent by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], passes from the consideration of the Senate.

I think the Senate should understand precisely what the action of the Spanish minister has been. I am prepared myself to make many allowances for his peculiar position, but I do think that what he has done was entirely unbecoming in a minister from Spain to the United States. The communication to which the Senator from Massachusetts has alluded I have in my hand. It is contained in the Sunday New York Herald, of March 8. It is dated at "The Spanish Legation, Washington, D. C., March 7, 1896," and is signed with the facsimile signature of the minister. The headnotes are as follows:

THE SPANISH MINISTER CRITICISES AND REFUTES STATEMENTS MADE BY UNITED STATES SENATORS IN CONGRESS—DEFENDS GENERAL WEYLER—WAR METHODS IN CUBA NOT DIFFERENT FROM THOSE IN FORCE IN OTHER REBELLIONS.

In the course of the article thus signed by him are the following statements. He says that "the Senators have been misinformed," and that it is easy for him to prove that they have been misinformed. He further says:

I did not believe then that my work would be so easy and so short.

And proceeding to a deliberate and elaborate refutation of statements made upon the floor of the Senate, he quotes as follows:

Senator SHERMAN, in the sitting of February 28, quoted freely, among other things * * *

In another place he says:

Senator SHERMAN in his speech said—

Then he states what the Senator from Ohio said.

In another place he says:

Senator MORGAN, in the sitting of February 24, spoke the following words—

Then follows what the Senator from Alabama said.

Further on the Spanish minister says:

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, in a speech made February 25, quoted, etc.—

Then follows what the Senator from Massachusetts said; and the Spanish minister says:

The translation which has been given to the Senator from Massachusetts is a fraud.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say that in the letter which I have seen—I do not know that it is the same one from which the Senator is reading—the remarks which are attributed to me are misquoted from the RECORD and not truly quoted.

Mr. CHANDLER. That illustrates the point I am making.

Elsewhere the Spanish minister says:

Senator LODGE also said that the treaty of Zanjon had been violated—

And he kindly says in this communication:

The paper to which I refer is at the disposal of the Senator from Massachusetts and of anybody who wants to see it.

He undertakes to make a direct communication with the Senator from Massachusetts, and then, after defending Spain for the alleged atrocities in the Island of Cuba, he refers to the late American civil war, and uses this language:

In an English paper of those days I read the following opinion of the American civil war: "Stripped of its trappings, it is a mere quarrel for territory; the antagonists are acting like Delawares and Pawnees. War to the knife, pushed to absolute extermination, is what they have resolved on, and the people breathe a language of massacre and extermination."

Then he goes on to say:

This charge was no more justified than the charges which are brought now against Spain.

Mr. President, it must be manifest, I think, to the Senator from Delaware that that communication ought not to have been written. If the minister from Spain is to sit down and write at the legation every morning an answer to what has been said by Senators and members of the House of Representatives the day before in the two Houses of Congress, manifestly the Senators and members of the other House will take occasion to reply to the minister the next day. Then we shall have the unseemly situation that Senators and members of the other House are criticised daily by foreign ministers in the newspapers of the country and the Senators and members are making replies.

Mr. GRAY rose.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the Senator interrupts me, I will ask him what he would think if Ambassador Bayard had written a communication, addressed to the editor of the London Times, in which he had selected statements made by Lord Salisbury, Mr. Chamberlain, and others in debate upon the Venezuelan question and had replied to them under his own signature, dating his reply from the embassy? Would not the Senator from Delaware think that would be an improper proceeding, for which the ambassador ought to be recalled?

Mr. GRAY. I was only going to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that he misunderstood me if he thought I said that the minister from Spain could not be convicted of a technical violation of that diplomatic usage and diplomatic law which forbids the attempt to make an expression of opinion otherwise than through the ordinary channels.

But I did want to say, and intended to say—I do not know whether I expressed myself clearly or not—just what the Senator from New Hampshire said at the outset, that great allowances ought to be made for the Spanish minister in the present case; and feeling as I do in regard to this whole matter of Cuba, feeling the sympathy which I can not restrain the expression of in regard to what is going on there in that island to achieve independence, I also feel that magnanimity and forbearance on the part of the citizens and on the part of the Government of the United States toward Spain would be becoming and strengthen the attitude of those who really feel that Cuba ought to be free and hope that she may be free.

Mr. CHANDLER. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Delaware says; but I do think that there is a little too much of this kind of criticism of the debate in Congress. We were deluged yesterday, not merely with this formal and carefully prepared reply of the Spanish minister, but we had a communication from Minister Castillo, we had a communication from Castelar; and I see in the New York Journal of March 3 the president of the council of ministers of Spain sends a communication to the United States, in which he takes occasion to express the disgust which Spain feels at the proceedings of the American Congress. I do not know whether the Senator from Maine put that communication in his speech or not, or whether he referred to it, but I do say to the Senator from Delaware that the question that is now before the Senate can be discussed with more dignity, with more propriety, and with more forbearance if the United States Senate is not to be drawn into a debate, first on the floor of this Chamber, and again in the newspapers of the country, between themselves and the minister of Spain accredited to the United States.

Mr. GRAY. That is just what I deprecate, Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——
Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I desire——
Mr. HALE. I did not know that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was through. I was going to call his attention to a matter.
Mr. FRYE. If my colleague will allow me, I simply wanted in that connection to call to the attention of the Senate an incident which illustrates exactly the opposite course pursued by a foreign ambassador to that pursued by the Spanish minister.
Mr. HALE. I yield to my colleague.
Mr. FRYE. There was a bill pending before the Committee on Commerce which affected the commercial interests of Germany very seriously. I did not know whether they had an attorney here or an agent or not, and therefore I communicated directly with the ambassador, informed him that such a bill was pending affecting the interests of his country, and asked him if he wished to have anything to say in relation to it through himself or through any agent or attorney. He very promptly replied to me that he could not, with any propriety whatever, directly address the committee, or Congress, or any member of the committee, or any member of Congress, but that he had some views which he desired to express, and that they would be presented through the Secretary of State of the United States, and the next day I received a communication from the Secretary of State with the views of the German ambassador.
Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not know that I need say a word after what has been so calmly, so discriminately, and so well said by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]; but all that has taken place this morning, all that has been said here, arises from the fact that yesterday, in discussing this most important question, I saw fit to introduce into the debate a statement made in the public press by the gentleman who is now the representative of the Spanish monarchy to this Republic. I do not regret that I had the opportunity to do that, and that I acted upon it. I had sat here day after day and had heard inflammatory discussion and censure of a nation with which we are at peace, based not upon one single official report, upon nothing coming from the State Department, that has in charge the relations of this Republic with other nations and with other Governments, not one report, but simply extracts from papers and alleged documents the authenticity of which nobody could account for and nobody could state. In answer to those, I looked about for what I could find in current literature. I am glad that I found the statement of the minister from Spain as published in the New York and in the Washington newspapers.
Mr. President, I do not agree in any censure which may be visited upon that official for what he did. It is not like the case cited by my colleague. The Spanish minister did not attempt by communication with the State Department to make any comment upon a coordinate branch of the Government, as he would perhaps have had no right to do; but he found himself here, as everybody finds himself or herself, reading every day the great newspapers and the little newspapers. and all the newspapers which record current events; and when the Spanish minister made the New York World and the Washington Post the depositaries of his views on this subject he simply did what was natural under the circumstances, and instead of raising any issue of veracity—I take the word from what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said—with any Senator here, nothing of that kind was done; instead of unkindly censuring anybody in the Senate, the Spanish minister had that sense of fitness of things, which I hope will always characterize his intercourse here, to make the entire tone of his communication as careful and as nice in its observance of courtesy and in its deference to Senators as it is possible for human language to make it. Any Senator who will read the communication which he made will see that it is couched not even in terms of criticism. He was desirous in a fair way to correct errors. He sought to remove impressions which existed in the minds of Senators through the press that he believed they would thank him for removing.
Mr. President, Senators have all at once become impressed with the dignity of this body to the extent that it must not in any way consider newspaper communications. That day has passed. It is said that no foreign minister has a right to go to the newspapers to make his statement. I deny it. That is not the way in which to-day the world is conducted. The great newspaper, the newspaper which is read and properly influences public sentiment, has invaded realms which thirty years ago would have been considered sacred and with which no newspaper pretended to deal. The great men of the earth are proud to make their position known, not only on literary or legal questions, but on pending questions of amity, of commerce, of relations in their own Government and with other countries. Mr. Gladstone writes communications to the newspapers and the magazines on both sides of the Atlantic touching great questions of American policy, and everybody is glad to read them. Nobody complains because Mr. Gladstone wrote an eloquent communication, taking the other side upon what some of us believe, in reference to the tariff.
Mr. GRAY. Let me put this case to the Senator from Maine: Suppose some member of Parliament in his place in the House of Commons or the House of Lords had said that it was a matter of history, quoting from some supposititious writer, or real writer, that when Major Andre was executed, or before he was executed, he was tortured by General Washington, had his eyes burned out with red-hot irons, do you suppose that the American ambassador at London might not, with perfect propriety, point out either that the history was an unauthentic one or that a mistake had been made in the reading of such a grewsome and false statement?
Mr. HALE. I suppose on the next morning every reader of the London Times would have found on his table a polite and courteous letter from Mr. Bayard to the editor of the London Times, setting right the error of history and of fact. We never will live in a time when, under circumstances which so aptly have been presented by the Senator from Delaware, a foreign minister will not do that.
Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator a question?
Mr. HALE. Yes.
Mr. TELLER. That is not a case at all analogous to the present. That would be with reference to something that has passed into history, but this action of the Spanish minister is intended to influence pending proceedings in this body. That is where the offense comes in.
Mr. HALE. All debate is illustrative, and the instance given by the Senator from Delaware would have arisen in the British Parliament upon some debate on a pending question, and not upon some question of how the Revolutionary war was conducted, and the American ambassador would have had a right to correct history and correct facts.
Mr. President, I am glad that Canovas, the prime minister of Spain, saw fit to send that calmly-worded, discreet, and wise dispatch to a great New York paper. I was glad a few months ago, when the public was in some condition of excitement with reference to a controversy with another country, that the heir-apparent to the British Crown and a near relative of his thought it advisable to send a kindly and propitiatory message to a great New York newspaper, and I did not consider that even royalty had abated any of its dignities because the Prince of Wales saw fit to do that.
The truth is that it has become the fashion, it has become the practice—it will never recede—for all public men to go to the newspapers, to the magazines, and to the reviews, and there write themselves down fully upon any subject-matter which pertains to the present, and that is discussed either by their own parliament, or in diplomatic circles, or whatever it may be; and until the Spanish minister shall, by his language or by false criticism, or by invidious statement, overstep the bounds which any gentleman may observe in his communications, I believe he is not entitled to our censure or our reproach.
Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the proposition which has been advanced here by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and by other Senators, that it is not seemly that we should be discussing in the Senate with the representative of a foreign power; but it is he who began the debate. I did not bring the utterances of the Spanish minister into the Senate. They were brought in here by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and among those utterances the Spanish minister said that I had been imposed upon by a malicious and fraudulent misrepresentation.
That is a pretty serious charge, Mr. President. I think I was justified in replying to it. If it was a malicious and fraudulent misrepresentation, it was my duty to withdraw it; and if it was not, it was my duty to show that it was not; and I have shown it, and shown by the original document that the statement of the Spanish minister in that respect was not correct.
Mr. President, these eloquent defenses of the Spanish minister I find no fault with; but I think that even a United States Senator is entitled to some rights; and I think when he is accused of doing things like that, he has the privilege, at least, of showing that he is right and that his accuser is wrong.
I am not going to enter into the subject of carrying on diplomatic negotiations by newspaper, which the Senator from Maine has so eloquently described, citing as examples of diplomatists the Prince of Wales and Mr. Gladstone, neither of whom hold diplomatic positions. I am not going into that large question. I am going to call the attention of the Senate merely to this fact: In the first place, I did not allude in the remotest way to the disturbances in Spain, nor did I allude to past history. I do not think the Senator from Delaware knew exactly what it was that I was correcting. I read an interview of General Weyler's about six weeks ago, before he left Spain, as to his future policy in Cuba, which I think was pertinent. The authenticity of that interview was denied by the Spanish minister. I have produced the Spanish newspaper containing it. That is all I can do.

Now, Mr. President, there is one other point. The Senator from Maine thinks that this is an admirable thing that the Spanish minister has done. At the end of his interview the minister says:

I said nothing when that language was used in the press, but I believe it is my duty, although against the conventionalities of my position—

Even he admitted that—to appeal, as I have said, to the honest common sense of the American people when those words are uttered from the Capitol of the United States.

He takes an appeal from the representative body of the United States to the people. As we are talking of history, Mr. President, I should like to ask Senators if they have forgotten the case of Genet? He was a minister of the French Republic to the United States. He appealed from the Government to the people of the United States, and George Washington turned him out of the country. Now, Washington, I suppose, would be called a jingo and would be taken to task to-day for his untimely action; but he was considered in his day and generation a man of good judgment; and when the French minister appealed from the action of the Administration to the people of the United States Washington thought it was sufficient to justify asking for his recall.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, the Spanish minister has taken no such action.

Mr. LODGE. He has appealed from the Congress of the United States——

Mr. HALE. He has not appealed from the Congress of the United States, I say to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I beg your pardon.

Mr. HALE. He has appealed not from the action of the Government——

Mr. LODGE. I beg your pardon.

Mr. HALE. He has appealed to the American people for the opportunity to state what he considers is the truth, which he alleges was not covered in the statements made in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what Genet tried to do, although he appealed against the administrative branch to the people. He appealed against what he thought had been done.

Mr. HALE. He appealed from the Administration.

Mr. LODGE. Did the Administration state that the Senate had no right?

Mr. HALE. No, but the Senate is not the Government, though it is an important part of the Government.

Mr. LODGE. I did not pretend to say that it was the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Neither is the Administration the Government.

Mr. LODGE. The error Genet made was in taking an appeal to the people against the Government of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Against the action of the Government.

Mr. LODGE. Against the action of the Government of the United States, if you please.

Mr. HALE. Not against statements of fact.

Mr. LODGE. Against both what had been said and done by Washington; and Washington asked for his recall.

Mr. GRAY. I was going to remind the Senator, in regard to the interesting illustration of our past history of Washington and the French minister, Genet, that that person undertook to enlist men and fit out ships of war in this country to aid the Republic of France.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly aware of that; but that was not the ground on which the recall was finally asked. Washington waited through all that period when he was trying to do those things, until he made that appeal, and on that ground particularly he asked for his recall.

Mr. President, only a few years ago another diplomatic representative who was conducting negotiations through the newspapers advised an American citizen how to vote. He did not interfere with the Senate or with Congress or with the Government. He simply offered his opinion, and the present President and the present ambassador to London united in insisting on his recall.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that it was a private letter which the minister wrote, and it got into the newspapers. It was not intended for publication.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; and that makes the case only so much stronger.

Mr. HALE. In relation to issues then pending before the American people in the November elections.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. HALE. An entirely different case.

Mr. LODGE. And issues are pending now in Congress.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LODGE. I will sit down in a moment and give way for morning business. I desire to finish what I was saying.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I insist upon the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for my colleague to finish his statement.

Mr. PALMER. The point of order is that morning business should be proceeded with.

Mr. LODGE. How can I be taken off the floor at this stage?

Mr. PALMER. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask unanimous consent that my colleague may finish his remarks? Certainly no Senator will object to that.

Mr. PALMER. Unquestionably; I would do more than that; but it occurs to me that this subject is exhausted and the morning hour is passing away.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois insist upon the point of order?

Mr. PALMER. I make no objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. I am indebted to the Senate for their kindness in allowing me to finish. I merely wish to say that I had no desire to bring in this matter of the Spanish minister. I think the whole debate is a result of the misfortune of the Spanish minister's undertaking to correct the Senate as to words uttered in debate and as to Senators bringing in his utterances. I have set the point right on which he assailed me, and I have nothing more to say. My own views are very clear as to the propriety of his conduct. I have said sufficient on that point, and that is all I desire to say this morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1825) to incorporate the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, each with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 72) directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 15,000 copies of the work on Apiculture compiled by the Department of Agriculture, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 270) changing the time of holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of California;

A bill (H. R. 818) to provide for the care and cure of inebriates in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 2684) for the relief of S. W. Peel for services rendered the Old Settler Cherokees;

A bill (H. R. 5105) to abolish days of grace on promissory notes, drafts, etc., in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 6195) amending the statutes relating to the sale of printed copies of patents;

A bill (H. R. 6994) relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (H. Res. 99) to supply the State of Kansas with copies of the muster rolls of the Third and Fourth Regiments of Kansas Infantry; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 133) directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for necessary repairs at Cleveland Harbor.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 162) regulating proof of death in certain pension cases;

A bill (H. R. 1712) granting to the First Regiment North Carolina State Guard two condemned cannon; and

A bill (H. R. 2300) to incorporate the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree of Scottish Rite Masonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. ELKINS presented the petition of Rev. A. Tuttle and 27 other citizens of Hardy County; the petition of Rev. J. J. Mason and 42 other citizens of Jackson County; the petition of W. M. Slaughter and 51 other citizens of Mason County; the petition of John H. Spragg and 36 other citizens of Monongalia County; the petition of Isaac Wagner and 49 other citizens of Pleasants County; the petition of Rev. G. C. Bedford and 253 other citizens of Preston County; the petition of J. B. Phelps and 28 other citizens of Ritchie County; the petition of L. C. Collett and 35 other citizens of Tucker County; the petition of L. D. Bryan and 100 other citizens of Wayne County; the petition of S. W. Stephens and 49 other citizens of Wood County; the petition of Ira Stafford and 58 other citizens of Preston County, and the petition of F. C. Neptune and 86 other citizens of Roane County, all in the State of West Virginia, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and also against the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CARTER presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a union mass meeting held in Helena, Mont., February 9, 1896, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the protection of Americans in Turkey, and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the board of county commissioners of Helena, Mont., praying for the passage of House bill No. 3339, to create a special commission on highways and to make appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KYLE. I am directed by the Select Committee to Establish the University of the United States, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1202) to establish a university of the United States, to report it with amendments, and to submit a report thereon. The papers accompanying the report will be presented to the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. WALTHALL subsequently said: Just as I came into the Chamber I noticed that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], from the Select Committee to Establish the University of the United States, reported favorably a bill to establish a national university. I desire to say that there are several members of the committee, myself included, who do not unite in that report, and I ask leave at a later day to submit the views of the minority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1679) for the relief of Helen Larned, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2132) for the relief of settlers upon lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2461) to grant land to the State of Alabama for the use of the Industrial School for Girls of Alabama, and of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2063) to grant land to the State of Alabama for the use of the Industrial School for Girls of Alabama, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2107) to grant land to the State of Alabama for the use of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 461) for the relief of the trustees of the German Evangelical Church of Martinsburg, W. Va., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 517) for the relief of Thomas Williams, an employee of the Senate folding room, for injuries received while in the discharge of his duties, in the year 1892, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1548) for the relief of Alexander Stoddart, of New York, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 605) relieving the personal representatives of John Sherman, jr., late United States marshal for the Territory of New Mexico, from the requirements of section 833 of the Revised Statutes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BRICE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 601) granting a pension to Clara R. Rodgers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2194) granting a pension to Mrs. Weltha Post Leggett, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1565) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Howland, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 519) for the relief of Marshall R. Hathaway, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1555) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States revenue cutter Gallatin off the coast of Massachusetts, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 688) for the relief of Thomas S. Lutterloh, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2055) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Christine C. Barnard, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1004) for the relief of Mrs. Alice M. Walsh, to submit an adverse report thereon. I desire to call the attention of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to this bill, as he introduced it.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the bill may be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections I desire to present the report of that committee upon the resolution submitted on January 7, 1896, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], proposing an inquiry concerning the election in Alabama in 1894. The resolution was reported by me on the 3d instant with an amendment, and is now on the Calendar. The views of the minority will be presented later. I ask that the report may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 662) for the relief of William S. Grant, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1854) removing the charge of desertion from the name of Thomas Collins, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2462) to provide for making of allotments of pay by officers of the Navy and Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2251) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill just reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is one of importance, and it is very desirable that immediate action should be taken. It is a bridge bill about which there is no controversy whatever. I ask that it may be taken up and put on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois for the present consideratiom of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us get through with the morning business.

Mr. CULLOM. It is merely a little bridge bill. It will take but a moment to pass it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us get through with the morning business.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well. I have no objection if I can get up the bill after the morning business shall have been concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2463) to regulate certain prosecutions in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2464) granting a pension to John Eckland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2468) granting a pension to Ann Connolly; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2469) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to quitclaim and release unto Francis Hall and Juriah Hall and their heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the east 20 feet front by the full depth of 100 feet of lot 2, in square 493, in the city of Washington, D. C., as laid down on the original plan or plat of said city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2470) for the relief of D. M. McEacheran; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2471) to provide for the publication of the Revolutionary archives in the Department of State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2472) to repeal an act entitled "An act to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad in the District of Columbia," approved April 30, 1892, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANTLE introduced a bill (S. 2473) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for holding terms of court in the district of Montana," approved July 20, 1892; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2474) to provide fees for the officers of the Federal courts in the States of South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, and Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PRITCHARD (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2475) for the relief of Soloman S. Crosswhite; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2476) granting a pension to Sarah E. Thompson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2477) granting an increase of pension to Robert P. Wild; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2478) granting a pension to certain East Tennesseeans engaged in the secret service of the United States during the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2479) for the relief of the widow and children of Dr. Lemuel H. Draper; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CANNON introduced a bill (S. 2480) to enable claimants to mineral lands to obtain patents; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 2481) granting a pension to Charles Edson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 2482) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to loan two condemned cannon to the Confederate Home of Missouri, located at Higginsville, Lafayette County, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 95) directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for necessary repairs at Cleveland Harbor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

STATEMENT OF CUBANS IN ARMS.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the letter of Hon. T. Estrada Palma to Hon. Richard Olney, Secretary of State, of the date of December 7, 1895, and accompanying documents, be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

PUBLIC-LAND SURVEYS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate at the earliest date possible the progress and result of public-land surveys in the Indian Territory under direction of the Geological Survey, together with the acreage or mileage surveyed and the cost per acre or per mile; also the character and frequency of the monuments marking said surveys, and whether such monuments conform to those heretofore prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the survey of public lands; also the character of paraphernalia and equipment required to execute said survey and the expense of same; also whether experienced deputy surveyors of public lands have been called in to assist in the work under the Geological Survey; also whether the persons who are in immediate charge of the survey in the Indian Territory are under bonds for the faithful performance of their work in a practical and efficient manner, in accordance with the rules and requirements pertaining to public-land surveys.

HEARING BEFORE COMMITTEE ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CALL. I submit a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the committee, the usual number of copies of the report of a hearing before the Committee on Woman Suffrage, January 28, 1896.

Mr. HOAR. Was the resolution correctly read, that the document is to be printed for the use of the committee? Should it not be for the use of the Senate?

Mr. CALL. It ought to be for the use of the Senate. I did not observe that language. I will modify the resolution in that respect.

There was a request made on the part of the woman's suffrage convention held here that the number of copies of the hearing had before the committee should be largely increased. I suggest that the resolution may be made a joint resolution so as to provide for the additional number of 5,000 copies. However, I withdraw the suggestion for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to give notice that on Monday next, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, with its permission, I shall address the Senate in regard to the bill (S. 2147) establishing additional regulations concerning immigration to the United States.

CONSIDERATION OF CUBAN RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. CULLOM addressed the Chair.

Mr. CULLOM. I rose, on the supposition that morning business had been concluded, for the purpose of calling up the bill for which I asked consideration a while ago.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the resolution which I submitted yesterday may be laid before the Senate as a part of the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HOAR, as follows:

Resolved, That the consideration of the report of the conference committee on the Senate concurrent resolution 19, relating to Cuba, be postponed until Monday, April 6, and that the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed before that time to report to the Senate the facts which, in their opinion, justify the passage of said resolution, together with the evidence thereof.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether he desires to occupy the attention of the Senate at this time on the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to take the floor on the resolution, to which I am entitled, and then, if the Senate has no objection, it would be agreeable to me to have the resolution go over until to-morrow with the same right which it has to-day. I am not in very good health (of course I would not ask that it be laid over on that account alone), and if I were to proceed beyond 2 o'clock I would interrupt the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who is already in the middle of a speech on the election case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall object to the resolution at every stage in which it is presented. I regard it as a reflection upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, which spent one month laboriously considering the question now under debate. Now, after the two Houses have by overwhelming majorities adopted such resolutions, I am decidedly opposed to having a resolution introduced here to postpone the subject until April 6 next to be discussed in a mock debate. I therefore object.

Mr. HOAR. Does my friend object to the usual courtesy of a postponement of the resolution until to-morrow?

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator wishes to give his opinion upon the Cuban question it is before him—upon the action of the two Houses of Congress—and he can at any time when the question is up move to postpone its consideration until the 6th of April. This is a resolution introduced to divert the argument and debate from the consideration of the action of the two Houses into a mock debate such as we have had here recently in the morning hour. I therefore object to it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned a word, the Senator from Ohio is a man of marvelous penetration and of great scientific attainments, but I doubt whether he has so mastered the new discovery of the X rays that he can penetrate into my brain through a pretty thick skull and know what was my motive in introducing the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I think I can. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say that I have no such motive or purpose. I wish to call the attention of the Senate not to the merits or demerits of this Cuban resolution, but to a practice which seems to be growing up in the Senate in regard to dealing with our foreign relations. I wish to point out that the Committee on Foreign Relations, instead of taking the ordinary method of action by the Government prescribed by the Constitution, have carefully avoided and shrunk not only in this, but in another important matter connected with our foreign relations from the ordinary constitutional method of having the American people act, which is by Senate, House, and President, and the whole thing is nothing but a moot debate. If there is a moot debate anywhere it is when the Senate of the United States is asked, or the two Houses by concurrent resolution are asked, to declare something which has no significance whatever when it is declared. The American people are not bound, Congress is not bound, the President is not bound, no individual American is bound by the resolution which is now before the Senate on the report of the committee of conference. If it is a reflection on any honorable committee of this body to like another measure or another method of proceeding rather than that which they prefer, it is a reflection which is cast every time a measure of any sort is debated. I respect the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I respect them quite as much when I express an honest difference from their method of proceeding as when I agree with them.

Now, here is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts indulge me for a question?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will let me just make my reply to the Senator from Ohio first, then I will hear him.

Mr. President, I object to this doing business with one-half of our pair of scissors. If we have any diplomatic knots to cut, let us have the two halves together, as the Constitution provided for cutting them, and not Congress without the President, or the President without Congress.

Now, there is another thing. The smallest pension claim, the smallest claim for a hundred dollars against this Government, is always accompanied by the committee that reports in its favor by a report of the evidence and a report of its finding of the facts.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I have given to the Senator from Massachusetts all the information——

Mr. HOAR. Let me make my point, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator gets up and attacks my resolution and states what my motives are, and that I mean to reflect on the committee, before I have been heard, and when I begin to state my point he gets up again and demands that he shall state further.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing the Senator from Massachusetts shall go on in the way he is proceeding.

Mr. HOAR. I did not precipitate this debate. I asked that the resolution might go over until to-morrow. The Senator got up and made his attack on the resolution in the first place.

Mr. President, is it not true that you can not pass a measure giving $50 to the claimant against this Government without a written report, a finding of facts, which every Senator has the right to have read at the desk? Yet here is a grave foreign complication, in regard to which the former chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations said he brought into the Senate a sword which Spain was at liberty to take up if she chose, and that he made his report, or the person who was the representative of the Committee on Foreign Relations in presenting this measure stated that it was done with the full understanding that it would not be unlikely to bring on war.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Massachusetts say that I——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me.

Mr. MORGAN. I demand that you shall allow me, because you have misquoted me.

Mr. HOAR. Then I shall be very glad to have the Senator correct the statement; but I wanted to finish the sentence.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not say that I brought into the Senate a sword and offered it to Spain, and she could take it up if she chose. I made no such statement. What I stated was this: When this subject first came up in committee, after we had under consideration more than a thousand petitions from the people of the United States, including a joint resolution from the general assembly of the State of New York, I said to the committee that we would have to do one of two things, report back those petitions, memorials, and resolutions adversely, and ask to be discharged from the consideration of them, or turn our face in the other direction, and that whenever we did so I was conscious that the folly and overstrained pride of Spain would force her into improper and wrongful belligerency toward us, and that we would have to be prepared to engage in war; and in such a case as that I drew my sword and laid it upon the table of the committee, and Spain could take it up if she chose to do so.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; that is it.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not say what the Senator stated.

Mr. HOAR. I accept the Senator's version of what he said. If there is any difference between his and mine I do not yet see it. It may be different, however.

Here is this grave matter in regard to which the honorable Senator used the figure which he has just again stated, which I understand to be that he had laid down his sword on the table and which Spain might take up if she chose, and we have no finding of the facts brought before the Senate in any authentic way. We have a message of the President of the United States addressed to the House of Representatives and containing merely the correspondence of consuls and nothing else. Now, the Senator from Ohio, for the first time since my resolution was introduced, brings in what he says was before the committee and printed by them, and that Senators might have had if they had known it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Printed for the exclusive use of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Printed for the exclusive use of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to correct the Senator. That paper was used in the debate here. I read from it page by page. The Senator was absent for a week. He does not know what has been going on here the last week.

Mr. HOAR. This document never was printed for the use of the Senate. It has never been laid before the Senate in any formal way. It has been printed by the committee; and as to the mere fact that the chairman of the committee quoted from it at some time, I am sorry to say it is the case that even the wise and admirable speeches of my honorable friend from Ohio are not listened to by all Senators who are here, and I dare say that he may have quoted some document which Senators who were present did not know about. But at any rate, it does not contain the conclusions of the committee. It is the statement of the agent of the Cuban belligerents or insurgents made to our State Department. Whether there is any answer to it anywhere, whether it is true or untrue, whether the Committee on Foreign Relations believe it or not, nobody knows at this moment. Is that the finding of a fact on which the Senate of the United States is to proceed in a grave matter affecting our foreign relations? Now, I do not like this constant meddling with our diplomatic affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he can devise any means by which the Senate of the United States, or even the President of the United States, can get agents sent into Cuba to-day for the purpose of gaining the information?

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean therefore we should act without information because of the difficulty of getting it?

Mr. MORGAN. Without that information we had to act.

Mr. HOAR. I understand. My point is, that we ought to have a finding of the conclusion, and the proof formally and officially and in print, coming from this committee.

Mr. MORGAN. We have the consular reports that have been sent to the House formally and officially, and they sustain the case.

Mr. HOAR. That is what the Senator now says, but no committee of this body have done what the committees do in the case of a fifty-dollar claim; and we do not know whether those consular reports are true, whether they contain the whole case, whether this statement of the belligerent counsel is true, whether that contains the whole, or whether there is any answer to that case, and what the Committee on Foreign Relations believe on this subject except from the impassioned speeches of some of its members.

Mr. President, I do not think this is the way for the people of a great country to conduct their foreign relations. I do not think it is the way to deal with subjects which may lead us into a great complication and bring on war. I think we ought to let our diplomatic agencies alone and not be discussing this question in the Senate, or very much either in the press or in the pulpit, as we have been doing of late days.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him where we got the information upon which we acted in regard to Armenia, which he so earnestly sustained here?

Mr. HOAR. What I proposed to do in regard to Armenia was exactly this: I proposed to say to the President that the Senate were ready to sustain him in any measures he might see fit to take for the protection of the property and life of American citizens in Armenia. It did not require any other information.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to read the dispatch which he sent to the President in reference to Armenia? It is dated November 25:

To the PRESIDENT, Washington:

You may depend on my support in the Senate, both by speech and vote, of the most vigorous action you may take to prevent further cruelties toward the Armenians in Turkey, even if you determine to treat the persons who commit them as pirates or common enemies of the human race.

GEORGE F. HOAR.

Now, what sort of an investigation did the Senator make? And I wish to ask the Senator whether he wanted to attach a provision to that, "provided you do not do it before April 6 next"?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I had investigated that subject thoroughly and to the bottom. That was my individual action as an individual citizen, and as an individual Senator, and I was prepared to state anywhere the conclusions of fact upon which I rested. That is just what I want the Senate of the United States to do in this case. I want it to have the conclusions of fact upon which it acts made formally, so that we can know what it is that governs our action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I should like very much to proceed with my remarks either now or to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution goes over.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate will bear in mind that I stated to the Senate that I was out of health this morning, and the Senator from Ohio arose and undertook to attack in advance the resolution that I had introduced, and to impute to me very improper motives, which he imputed in a very improper way. I ask that my resolution may keep its place to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 818) to provide for the care and cure of inebriates in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 5105) to abolish days of grace on promissory notes, drafts, etc., in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. 6994) relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia.

The bill (H. R. 270) changing the time of holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of California was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 2684) for the relief of S. W. Peel for services rendered the Old Settlers Cherokees was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 6195) amending the statutes relating to the sale of printed copies of patents was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 99) to supply the State of Kansas with copies of the muster rolls of the Third and Fourth regiments of Kansas Infantry was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 133) directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for necessary repairs at Cleveland Harbor was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISTRICT STREET RAILWAY FRANCHISES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 9, 1896.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound into one convenient volume, at the Government Printing Office, all the various acts of Congress relating to street-railway franchises in the District of Columbia; and that 200 copies of the same shall be furnished for the use of the Senate, 400 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,500 copies for the use of and distribution by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

PRINTING OF BULLETIN ON APICULTURE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 15,000 copies of the work on apiculture compiled by the Department of Agriculture; which were referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 72) directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. HANSBROUGH, and Mr. WETMORE were appointed.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, just at the close of my remarks yesterday I was asked a question by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] as to the devolution of the Presidential office under the act of Congress dated January 19, 1886. I was asked a question with respect to that devolution when the exercise of the right of the functions of the Presidential office devolve upon the Secretary of State, whether the Secretary of State ceased to be such, and I answered that he did not, that he continued yet to be the Secretary of State. I wish now to call the attention of the Senate especially to the act of Congress which I have just mentioned, for two reasons. One is that I may notice the very close analogy between that act and the provisions of the Delaware constitution in respect to the devolution of the governmental authority; the other is that I may give to the honorable Senator from Kansas the reasons which I have for the answer which I made yesterday to the question he put. The act reads as follows:

"That in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President of the United States, the Secretary of State, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of the Treasury, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of War," or in the same contingency, the Attorney General, and in case of the death, resignation, or inability of the Postmaster-General, to go in with the same conditions to the Secretary of the Navy and afterwards to the Secretary of the Interior, "shall act as President until the disability of the President or Vice-President is removed, or a President shall be elected."

Under the construction given to this section by the majority in this case there might be in an ordinary Presidential term seven Presidents of the United States within the four years. It is very clear that such was not the intention of Congress. Congress does not make the officer succeeding to the Presidential functions, the President. This section does not provide that the Secretary of State shall cease to be Secretary of State on the assumption of the Presidential duties, or that he shall become President on the assumption of Presidential duties, but the act plainly enough intends that he shall not be President, and therefore imperatively implies that he continues to be Secretary of State.

Sir, I wish to call your attention to the proviso not yet read which is attached to the first section, at the end of it, and especially to the expression used by Congress in designating the person to whom this devolution of Presidential functions shall fall:

Provided, That whenever the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States shall devolve upon any of the persons named herein, if Congress be not then in session, or if it would not meet in accordance with law within twenty days thereafter, it shall be the duty of the person upon whom said powers and duties shall devolve to issue a proclamation convening Congress in extraordinary session, giving twenty days' notice of the time of meeting.

It would have been much briefer to have said "it shall be the duty of the President to issue a proclamation," but instead of designating this person as the President, Congress used a very long circumlocution, consisting of many words, the phrase "person upon whom said powers and duties shall devolve." In the same way it is provided in the constitution of Delaware. There is an expression very similar where the speaker of the house or where the speaker of the senate has died, where the secretary of state has performed or exercised the office of governor, and he is directed to summon the legislature in order by joint ballot to elect a substitute who shall discharge the functions of governor. That person is called not the governor, but a person to exercise the office of governor, and in the same section that person who can exercise said office is spoken of where a contingency occurs, if the governor-elect die, or become disqualified before the commencement of his term. It is not said "no governor," but "no other person who can exercise said office," and it is not said in the other section no governor, but it is said that "the person who shall exercise the office" shall do such and such things. So Congress have used the same refimenent of language (if the opposition see fit to call it so), in the act approved January 19, 1886, as the framers of the constitution of Delaware did in the fourteenth section of the third article.

Again, sir, let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact of the reasons why the Secretary of State does not become President. In the first place, it is directed that if the President and Vice-President both die or resign, the Secretary of State shall be invested with the Presidential functions. The constitution of Delaware provides that the governor shall appoint the secretary of state. Here is the section of that constitution:

A secretary shall be appointed and commissioned during the governor's continuance in office, if he shall so long behave himself well.

The statutes of the United States, provide that the President shall appoint the Secretary of State, so that the duty of the executive, both in the State and the United States, with respect to the Secretary of State is the same.

We will suppose, then, that the President and the Vice-President being both dead, the Secretary of State has devolved upon him the office of the Pesidency. If he be really the President, he can appoint his Secretary of State; he is authorized to appoint his Secretary of State. If the Secretary of State, upon whom first devolves these Presidential functions, dies, then the person whom he has appointed Secretary of State succeeds to the Presidency, and the person who succeeds to the Presidency being actually the President, under the construction of the majority, appoints another Secretary of State; and if he himself dies, this appointee of his succeeds to the Presidency. The chain is thoroughly broken, and if it was intended by this act to provide that the Secretary of State should cease to be Secretary of State and should become President, under this enactment the rest of the section is mere waste paper; the Attorney-General and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the others who are named subsequently in the section can never exercise the office of President. It is an utterly senseless provision. They will never come inside of the White House. They will never even get a scent of the Presidential flavor.

Sir, I wish to call attention again to certain things in grammatical analogy between the act of Congress of 1886 and the constitution of the State of Delaware. It will be seen here that the same language is used in this section which is used in the constitution of the State of Delaware in this phrase—seven times repeated: "Or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of the Treasury," shall succeed the Secretary of State.

That same language occurs in five different places in section 14 of the constitution of Delaware. For example:

If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability.

The same language, the same thought, and the same words are repeated five times in the Delaware constitution, and seven times in the act of Congress of 1886.

What does the pronoun "his" refer to in those clauses? Take the first one here:

In case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and the Vice-President of the United States, the Secretary of State, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of the Treasury, etc.

"His" in that clause certainly refers to the Secretary of State, in case of his death. Who is it that dies? It is the Secretary of State. Although he is in the performance of the Presidential function, the duties of the President have devolved upon him—expressly devolved upon him by virtue of the statute—yet he is, while performing the duties of President, Secretary of State; and if he dies during that performance, he dies as Secretary of State.

Let us take the same language in the constitution of the State of Delaware:

If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office, by his death, removal resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

Who is referred to when it is said "his death?" Certainly the death of the speaker. The majority of the committee claim that the speaker dies; that the speaker was dead when he assumed, and by the very act of assuming, the exercise of the functions of governor. The speaker was dead; the speakership was dead; the senatorship was dead. It had no existence. That is what is claimed by the majority of the committee, but the constitution of the State of Delaware declares that it is the speaker who dies. Whether he lives or dies while he is in the exercise of the executive function, he is yet the speaker of the senate, or the speaker of the house, or the secretary of state, or the person elected on joint ballot by the legislature, but he is never the governor.

I call the attention of the Senate also to the doctrine of incompatibility, as stated by the majority of the committee at great length in the written report, and at still greater length in the oral argument made by the able Senator who preceded me. They say it is incompatible that a State senator, the speaker of the senate, should at the same time exercise executive functions. They say that it is the English rule; they say that it is the American rule. Sir, what becomes of the doctrine of incompatibility, even if there ever was an ancient rule of this kind? This is the act of January 19, 1886, an act of Congress, passed by both Houses, approved by the President, and it provides for incompatibilities a thousandfold more harsh than anything in the constitution of the State of Delaware. For example, the Attorney-General under this act may succeed to the Presidential functions. The same officer at the same time may have employed months, perhaps years, in bringing to justice, either by the infliction of capital punishment or the judgment of felony upon some offender against the laws of the United States. As Attorney-General he may have done this, directed it, executed it, and yet in the exercise of the Executive function of the Presidency, which has devolved upon him under this law, the same Attorney-General, or the same person, has to look through the record and determine whether a pardon may not after all be granted to this offender. I can not conceive, I do not think any person can conceive, of two acts of any two functions more distinct, more incompatible, than is here provided for in the act of Congress of 1886.

Mr. GRAY. We all voted for that act.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; many members of Congress, in both branches, voted for the act of 1886.

Mr. GRAY. Including the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. TURPIE. Including the Senator from Oregon, as I am reminded by the honorable Senator from Delaware. It is a great deal stronger incompatibility than anything provided for in the constitution of the State of Delaware.

What is the reason of this? Mr. President, when a State undertakes the task of providing for the devolution of the duties of its chief executive, when a great nation undertakes the same task, they are not concerned with such trifles as have so long occupied the attention of the learned and honorable Senator from Oregon. What is the meaning of the term "devolution of the executive functions of a nation or a State"—devolution of the functions of the magistracy? It is the greatest, the most important act always; it has been in all the ages of the world, Who shall succeed the present executive? All the great wars of the world have been wars of succession. I do not except our own. The great question in that war was whether Abraham Lincoln, elected under the forms of law, should peaceably and quietly exercise the duties of the Presidency. He was not allowed to do so, and a war followed. It was a war of succession, the exact succession, the devolution of the executive authority, and when a question so utterly overshadowing and overpowering is to be disposed of in America by a State convention or by an act of Congress, those in council do not listen to the suggestion with reference to incompatibility. They say, as has been so often said, De minimis non curat lex; the highest law does not regard these smaller improprieties; they are subordinate to the public necessity and to the supreme power. The majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections take the position, under the constitution of the State of Delaware, that the senatorship and the speakership became vacant, or were suspended, while Senator Watson exercised temporarily the executive authority.

Further on the honorable and learned gentleman who preceded me in this argument said that either construction of the constitution would suit him. He does not care whether we read into it that the senatorship and the speakership became vacant or whether we rewrite it so that it shall say "the speakership and senatorship were suspended," absolutely suspended—either construction suits him. I was very much grieved. I did sincerely regret to hear such language from the learned Senator, a gentleman usually very guarded in his expressions, and especially in argument upon a law question. I can not conceive how we can deal in such a free and easy manner with such a grave paper as a State constitution; and when it is proposed seriously in argument here when two constructions are offered of the paramount law of a State, of the supreme law of a Commonwealth, and it is proposed by those who offer the two constructions that either may be taken, I do not think that such an alternative adds much to the constructions or adds much to the sincerity or good faith of the person who makes such an overture. I think that in such a paper as this there can be but one line of construction, but one construction, and the interpreter who undertakes to propose two, and says he is indifferent which is adopted, was certainly construing something else than the constitution of a sovereign State of the Union.

Sir, I know it would be a very usual thing in respect of an ordinary contract between individuals, frequently framed in the hurry of business, frequently framed in haste, often to be afterwards repented of, and it might be said in the construction of a last will or testament, that central focus of litigation in the civilized world, or it might be said with respect to an ordinary statute, describing how a stray pig should be advertised, sold, or disposed of—if it were such a matter as this, I should say there might be two constructions offered, and that a person might take whichever he chose, but when it comes to the supreme law of a country, I do not think that two constructions can be offered, with the liberty of taking either by the person who offers them.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TURPIE. Of course, two constructions may be offered, but it is the indifference of the offer that I am objecting to. It is of that sort which deprives it of any importance.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; for a question.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator unless he is perfectly willing, but I will simply state to the Senator from Indiana that if there can be but one construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware, then there is no room for any controversy here between the Senator from Indiana and myself. The Senator must concede that the constitution of the State of Delaware is open to at least two constructions. Otherwise there would be no room for any controversy at all between the Senator and myself. I suggest, and I have said in my report and in my speech, that the constitution of the State of Delaware is open to any one of three constructions, and I do not care which of two of those constructions is given the constitution, it makes my case; while, if the third construction that possibly may be placed upon it, and which the distinguished Senator from Indiana insists must be placed upon it, is correct, then that makes the Senator's case; and that is all there is to it.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I do not concede that there can be two constructions to the constitution of the State of Delaware, nor to any other constitution. There can be but one in the very nature of things. The supreme law is one; the supreme executive is one. I do concede that a person might offer two constructions or three constructions, or any other number of constructions, but a person who had offered a second construction in the true spirit of interpretation would certainly not conclude his overture by saying, "I am utterly indifferent as to which you accept." He would never arrive at anything in that spirit of interpretation. There is but one construction, and there can be but one correct construction, of this constitution.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not dispute that. Of course there can be but one correct construction.

Mr. TURPIE. I have no confidence in an attempted exposition of a grave state paper which proposes two several interpretations, with the accompanying corollary that you can have and take which you please. I wish to express my utter lack of confidence in that method of hermeneutics.

The honorable Senator from Oregon made a very elaborate and very ingenious and very learned commentary upon the law as contained in the provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware in argument of this case, and I have merely attempted to set over against the commentary of the honorable Senator the text of the instrument itself; that is all that I have contributed to this discussion, and I would not have done this much, unless it had been that, as the honorable Senator opened this discussion, and in his hands it took the course which I have indicated—the construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware—I felt bound, in deference to the majority of the committee and bound in deference to the chairman of that committee, of which I am a member, at least to pay some attention, and indeed very serious attention, to the views with which he has so ably entertained the Senate; but it was only out of deference to the course taken by the Senator from Oregon, it was only out of respect to the one who had the presidency of our committee, that I have at all noticed these constructions of the constitution of the State of Delaware, because I think the real question is, not in respect to any differences of opinion concerning the provisions of the constitution of Delaware, as to whether they be right or whether they be wrong, but the question in this case is, who shall judge and determine what these provisions are?

The question rather is, has the Senate of the United States any right or power to adjudge and decide these questions? In my view we have not. We have no power to adjudge or decide, but the whole question is coram non judice. The senate of the State of Delaware is made by the constitution of that State the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. That is the law of this case, and of all others. There is no other legislation respecting this subject-matter; there can be none. There is no body which can make laws or change laws with reference to the jurisdiction is such cases.

Now, in the case in argument, the case of Senator Watson, there is no question made as to his return as a senator of the State of Delaware; no question is made upon his credentials; there is no question made about his election; there is no question made about his qualifications at the time of his election; but it is claimed that, by some act done or suffered by him, he became disqualified as a senator and speaker of the senate to discharge those duties. Who is to judge whether he became disqualified or not? The judgment upon qualifications necessarily includes the judgment upon disqualifications, as a jury in a criminal case has submitted to it the question of guilt or innocence, and the verdict itself of guilty says not innocent, and the verdict of not guilty includes the question of guilt. The whole question of qualification or disqualification, or a man's being qualified or not qualified, is adjudged by the senate of Delaware. They have exclusive and original jurisdiction.

It is charged—and I believe there is no dispute here about the facts in the case—that Senator Watson was absent from the senate from the day after the governor died until the last day of the session. That is what the record shows; he was not in the senate during that period; and it is all that the record shows. It shows his absence. Was this a disqualification? Did this render him unqualified? Did he thereby become not qualified to act when he chose and to vote as he chose as speaker of the senate and as senator?

Absence, I grant you, Mr. President, if it be long continued and contumacious, may be a cause for expulsion, for ouster, but it never can be, and never can be equivalent to, a judgment, order, or resolution of the house for expulsion or vacation. The cause of judgment is not judgment. I may have a promissory note in my pocket of some Senator present, to which he admits there is no defense, no set-off, upon which I may take a judgment without question. Is the note a judgment? There is a case in the Senate. The honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] will very well recollect where a member of this body, about the middle of the full term of six years, left it, was absent that long. What he was doing while he was away I do not know, and no one else knows, and it is no concern of the Senate nor of any Senator what he was doing; but he was absent three years from this body.

Mr. FAULKNER. And paired all the time.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, and absent much longer than Mr. Watson was from the senate of Delaware. Was he thereby expelled? Did he thereby become disqualified?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He was not exercising the duties of another office.

Mr. TURPIE. I do not know and no one knows what he was doing while he was absent. Was he not qualified? Did it affect him at all? The Senator could return at any time he wished and vote. It was a case for which he might have been reprimanded or expelled, or had his seat vacated; but so long as his constituency made no complaint, and so long as there was no record, or a notice of his absence, it does not affect his functions as a Senator, and there is no record in the case of Watson of even an objection or cause of objection founded upon his absence; and, similarly, Mr. Watson's rights and functions as a senator and speaker were not affected by his absence.

There are only three ways in which the functions and rights of a sitting member of a legislative body can be affected: One is by death; that is very nearly self-operative. There is simply a notice given, and the fact is entered. Another is by resignation—very nearly self-operative. The resignation is merely filed or noted on the journal, and an order made to fill the vacancy. The third is—and it is the only remaining method of disqualifying a Senator or preventing him from exercising his rights or functions—a judgment, order, or resolution of the house of which he is a member, which must be shown by the journal of that house, either for his ouster or for his expulsion—death, resignation, an order of the house vacating the seat, or expelling him from the body.

I said death was very nearly self-operative. So it is. Resignation approaches it very nearly, though both of these circumstances are noted always briefly upon the journal. But as to ouster, how can that be self-operative? Can a man expel himself from a body? Is it not necessary to convey a conception of ouster or expulsion that some person should act, and act adversely, to his further performance of senatorial functions?

There is a very old punishment referred to by the learned Senator from Oregon, called suspension. Is that self-operative? Can a man suspend himself? No more than he can expel himself; no more than he can oust himself. Suspension has always been by judgment, and by judgment of the most technical character; but it is not an American practice at all. I have examined legislative history very carefully upon this point, and I find that no member of the United States Senate has ever been suspended; no member of the House of Representatives of the United States has ever been suspended; no member of any legislature of any of the States in this Union has ever been suspended. Perhaps it is a practice that might have prevailed during the time of the colonial assemblies, but the history of those assemblies is so meager that no question of that kind has come down to us; but in looking back three or four hundred years in the history of the English Parliament—there is no recent case—it will be found there that suspension by judgment, order, or resolution of the House of Commons was one of the penalties inflicted by parliamentary sentence. This suspension, however, was always by a written order and record, and a written order and record of the most technical character. A judgment of suspension against a member of the House of Commons—and they were very rare; there are very few instances of it, and no recent instances—was made upon complaint against him, and entered upon the journal of the House. It described, in the first instance, the time of suspension—not longer than forty days. It described, in the next instance, the functions which were suspended, to which I wish to call particularly the attention of the Senate. These functions are suspended: The franking privilege, the privilege of attending upon committees, the privilege of accepting the Chiltern Hundreds—in other words, preventing his resignation; he must stand and take punishment, something like the rule of the Army, where an officer under charges is not permitted to resign—the privilege of debate in most instances. These were affected and were named specially, and specially recited in the order, resolution, or judgment of the House for the suspension of a member. They were called parliamentary privileges, personal privileges. These were suspended. The House always made the distinction, and it is noticed in argument. The constitutional privileges of a member were never suspended; they could not be. The right to vote, the right to be present, the right to make motions, were never the subject of an order or judgment of suspension, because the House said, "All this is irrational; there is no reason why a constituency should be punished for the personal delinquency or dereliction of the member. We can not disfranchise the constituency. He must vote; he must attend; he must exercise his constitutional privileges; but we will suspend his personal parliamentary privileges."

What, then, does this ancient punishment called suspension amount to, as the learned Senator applied it in this case? Even if there had been an order of the senate of Delaware suspending Senator Watson, describing, as it would have done, the things as to which he was suspended—if he had been suspended—if there had been such an order, it could not have affected his right to attend the senate and to cast his vote in the joint convention as a senator. His constitutional privileges could not have been affected by such a suspension.

The learned Senator says Mr. Watson was self-suspended. That is the expression of the Senator. I do not see how he could be self-suspended any more than he could be self-expelled, or self-ousted. I am certain there is no penalty anywhere in Great Britain or any other country where parliamentary government obtains of a member who has ever been self-suspended or self-expelled or self-ousted. Mr. President, ouster is something, expulsion is something; suspension is nothing; it is not in the American practice at all. It is a mere shadow; it is a mere ghost raised up here, without flesh or blood in order to help out a case yet more ghostly and ghastly in its character.

Mr. Watson was absent—I am now going back to the absence—because he chose to remain away in the same way as in the instance of the Senator from Florida which I have noted. Was any action of the senate taken upon this absence? None whatever.

There have been a number of affidavits filed here with respect to what Mr. Watson said or did, or what he wished, or what he would not have done if it had not been for some other things there related. For my part, I do not think there is anything in the affidavits filed on either side of much importance. I regard them as of very little materiality to the settlement of this case. It is certain that the absence of Mr. Watson, however he might have been employed, could not and did not disturb his functions as a senator, or as speaker, unless there was a judgment, order, or resolution of the Delaware senate against him, adverse to him, on that account.

Why, sir, a member of this body might go and take his chair by the Vice-President, and might say, day after day, "I am no longer a member of this body; I do not intend to act any further with it; I do not desire to have any further part in your proceedings; I am going abroad; I am going home; I am going to sea." He might repeat it and repeat, and what notice could be taken of it? So might Mr. Watson have said, or any member of the senate of Delaware have said, the same thing in much more multifarious form, in much more expressive terms than any of these affidavits. What notice could the senate of Delaware take of such expressions? What notice can we take of them in the case I mention? None whatever. Here the Vice-President, finally considering the man was a bore, might say to him, "Why do you not file your resignation? We will be glad to accept it." That would end it.

It is useless for a man to say, "I am not a Senator; I am not going to vote; I am not going to take any part in your proceedings, and have no further functions here and no further duties here." At the same time he is here unchallenged, without resignation, and without charges against him. I care not what may be his condition elsewhere, unless there has been voluntary action on his part severing his connection with the body by a written resignation filed, and noticed in the journal, or by the adverse action of the body itself, he remains a Senator, notwithstanding his disclaimer, and he can vote, he can debate, he can make motions; he has all the powers and functions of any other member of the body.

It is the record which must disclose his disqualification, whether it be of resignation or of expulsion or of ouster.

There is another phrase used by the learned and honorable Senator from Oregon in describing what he is pleased to call the condition of Senator Watson after the executive function had devolved on him. He does not use it as often as he does the phrases "vacation" and "suspension," but once or twice he said "or held in abeyance." The functions of the Senator were either vacated, suspended, or held in abeyance. I have here a very large work on parliamentary law to which I shall refer afterwards. I have looked at a good many of them, and I do not find the term "held in abeyance" in any work on that subject. It is a total stranger. I do not now conceive what the meaning of it was, nor with what purpose the honorable Senator from Oregon used it. A state of abeyance existing in the State of Delaware! One expression is plain enough, but the other is nothing but obscurity, darker and darker. What is meant by a state of abeyance? Is it some mysterious missing link between ouster and expulsion? Has this state of abeyance some occult connection with the cathode rays, or is it related to the system of the lost Pleiades? It is a pure invention of the very rich and fertile imagination of my friend, the learned and honorable Senator from the State of Oregon. Whatever may affect our judgment in this case, I hope the judgment will not be affected by the dreamy invention of the Senator or of any of his coadjutors upon the question, but that it will be decided upon the law without shadows, and upon the evidence undeniable, without doubt.

Mr. President, the jurisdiction of the Delaware senate to decide whether Senator Watson had lost any of his functions as a senator or as speaker of the senate in performing the executive duties which under the constitution of the State devolved upon him—in other words, whether he had lost by the performance of his duty as a loyal citizen under the constitution of his State that office and those functions which the people of the county of Kent had given him under the hand and seal of their approval—that question is one of which the senate of the State of Delaware has jurisdiction original and exclusive. It is provided that they shall be the judges of the elections, qualifications, and returns of their own members. Mr. Watson was undoubtedly a member of the Delaware State senate. This provision means not only they are the judges of these things, but that nobody else is or can be the judge. It is exclusive. No committee of this Senate can be the judges. No court composed of United States Senators can be the judges. There is no tribunal possible which can be the judges of the fact or law whether he had lost any of the functions of a member of the senate of the State of Delaware.

I might for the sake of argument, and only for the sake of argument, admit everything stated or claimed by the honorable and learned Senator from the State of Oregon, and yet when you have the best of causes you must have a court which has the jurisdiction to determine it. Here is a counsel who might be furnished to-day with briefs and evidence in a case of divorce, absolutely insuperable, one in which the relief must be granted upon the facts and upon the record, one in which the relief of divorce could not be denied. But suppose he takes this case before a justice of the peace. Could he have relief? Could a divorce be granted? And here may be another eminent counsel with a bill in chancery, of perfect character, without flaw, without fault, without blemish, also entitled to complete relief. Can he file his bill in a court-martial? Would not the officer state to him immediately, "Sir, you have a good case; you undoubtedly have a right to recover, but we have no jurisdiction in such cases. We are not judges in such matters. The law does not authorize us to hear or determine such an affair.

Now, sir, a justice of the peace under our system of jurisprudence is not more absolutely denied and prohibited from hearing a divorce and granting it, a court-martial is not more absolutely denied and prohibited from hearing the depositions in a case in chancery and making a decree than the United States Senate is denied and prohibited from making any judgment in the case of Mr. Watson. We have no jurisdiction.

Senators might desire to act differently. They might desire to afford relief; they might desire to review a judgment or to make an original judgment in the case, but the senate of Delaware has original jurisdiction, exclusive jurisdiction, and the case whether good or bad must begin and end in the senate of Delaware.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TURPIE. With very great pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The question I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana is this: Suppose Mr. William T. Watson, instead of having succeeded to the exercise of the office of governor of Delaware, had been elected President of the United States, and had entered upon the exercise of the office of President of the United States, and pending the exercise of the office of President of the United States he had returned and taken his seat in the State senate of Delaware, and had voted for United States Senator, and had been recognized in the joint assembly as a member of the senate; does the Senator from Indiana mean to tell the Senate and to argue before the world that the Senate of the United States in a case like that, which is a parallel case, in my opinion, would be estopped from inquiring into his right to a seat in that body?

Mr. TURPIE. Of course I do. That is the very position I take.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question on the same line?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose Mr. Watson were dead and somebody else had come there (such cases happen often in popular elections) and said, "I am Mr. Watson, and am going to vote," and they let him, under the great temptation of getting a United States Senator or defeating him; would that have bound us also?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes; by all means.

Mr. HOAR. I think that is equally——

Mr. TURPIE. Allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the last part of the question, "Would that have bound us also?" I did not say we were bound by the hypothetical case of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon.

Mr. TURPIE. Neither case would have bound us. I will suppose that this man who is to be elected President of the United States under the hypothesis of the Senator from Oregon had been sentenced to the State prison and put in the garb and was serving there, and there had been no record of the Delaware senate with respect to his conviction. That would not in case of his escape have prevented him from appearing in the senate and voting for United States Senator.

There is an express case in the English Parliament upon that subject where a man had been committed under sentence of a capital charge. We must take the doctrine, no matter where it lands us. It might as well be settled here now. Who shall judge of the qualifications of individual members of State legislatures? If the State legislatures can not themselves judge, and judge exclusively, whether they judge right or wrong, the independent representation of the State government is abolished and all is centralized here in the Senate of the United States.

There is no longer any independence; there is no autonomy; there is no safety for the government of a State; there is no longer any representation of any State. They have a right to judge of the representation and of the representative. Your position is that they shall not; that we must judge of it.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me for a moment?

Mr. TURPIE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Carrying the illustration a little further, suppose it should be claimed here that Watson was dead, or that some other senator was dead, and that another man had come in and impersonated him, could we take evidence of the fact of death, or would the Delaware senate be the judge?

Mr. TURPIE. The Delaware senate would be the judge. We could not hear evidence on the false impersonation if there had been a judgment or recognition below.

Mr. HOAR. That presents the issue fairly, I think, on the two sides.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. Let me ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] if his contention goes so far, and it would seem that it does, that if there had been a judgment of the senate of Delaware that William T. Watson was ousted from the office of senator by exercising the office of governor, and that therefore there were only 29 persons in the joint assembly, it would be competent for the Senate of the United States to dispute that judgment and aver that there were 30?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. As to any question of fact that the State senate have the right in the first instance to pass upon, if they do pass upon the question of fact, I concede, as I did in my speech, that it would be binding on the Senate of the United States. In other words, if in the case I put, suppose the senator in the State of Delaware, instead of having succeeded to the exercise of the office of governor had been elected President of the United States and had entered upon the exercise of the office of President of the United States; suppose that question of fact had been submitted to the Delaware senate and the Delaware senate had decided that no such fact existed. Then whether it existed or not we perhaps would be bound by it.

Mr. GEORGE. Perhaps.

Mr. TURPIE. That fact would be very apparent, and it would be adjudged the moment the man came to vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In this case there is no question of fact. The fact is open, notorious, admitted by all parties to the controversy, that this State senator, this speaker of the senate, did succeed to the exercise of the office of governor, and was exercising the office of governor on the 9th day of May, 1895, when he went into the joint assembly and voted for United States Senator.

Mr. TURPIE. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And then he went back to the gubernatorial office.

Mr. TURPIE. There is no dispute whatever about that fact.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. None at all.

Mr. TURPIE. I am glad the Senator says so. All the predecessors in these instances, speakers of the senate, succeeding to the exercise of the governorship, went into the senate, acted as such, after the temporary term of executive authority had finished, showing that they remained senators during the duration of that interim.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Indiana has been kind enough to yield to me and I thank him very much. Right on this point, because all parties want to get at the truth on this question, I presume, I should like to hear the Senator from Indiana. I do not think he has touched it as yet. Perhaps he intends to do so, however, before he gets through. The Senator from Indiana has argued, and argued ably, that the speaker of the senate who succeeds to the exercise of the office of governor continues to be, not governor—he never does become governor——

Mr. TURPIE. No.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. But he continues to be senator.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He continues to be speaker of the senate during the whole of the time that he exercises the office of governor.

The history of this case shows that in several of the ten instances that have occurred where either the speaker of the senate or the speaker of the house has succeeded to the exercise of the office of governor, their terms as senator and speaker for which they were elected had expired by law long before they ceased to exercise the office of governor. This question I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Indiana: In the case of a speaker of the senate who has succeeded to the office of governor, and whose term as senator and speaker of the senate has expired, when he then continues to exercise the office of governor, does he do it as speaker of the senate and as senator, or does he do it as governor?

Mr. TURPIE. He does not do it as either. He does it by virtue of a statute and the constitution of the State of Delaware, which give him the right, as a person upon whom has devolved the duties of the executive office, to exercise and to hold over it until a governor—that is the word always; until a governor, not this person—is elected by the people.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President——

Mr. TURPIE. The Senator from Oregon will excuse me. He asked a question and I have answered it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. TURPIE. He does not do it as speaker or governor in that case.

I was a little surprised by one of the positions taken by the honorable and learned Senator from Oregon. Although many of his positions were fanciful, there was one very strange one. I never before heard it taken by any other Senator in debate. It was that the legislature of a State in respect to the qualifications, elections, and returns is a judge of the facts, the exclusive judge of the facts; but that the Senate of the United States is judge of the law. Now, I do not see anything in the constitution of any State, in the constitution of Delaware, or in the Constitution of the United States which justifies such a position. In both sections of the constitution the phrase is "shall judge." When a court tries a case it tries all the case. There is no jury. This would reduce the State house or senate to the position of a jury sitting only on and finding only facts. But when the court, this court, the Senate of the United States, judges of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members, it judges absolutely and exclusively all the facts, all the law, and if there are any other elements in the case other than facts and law, it would judge of those elements also. It is the judge, the one appointed, the one designated, the one to whom the power is delegated under the Constitution to hear, to determine, to decide every fact, every law, and every third element if there can be one imagined, which is necessary to decide the question as to the returns, elections, and qualifications of its members.

Mr. GRAY. Juridical facts as well as others.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir. Mixed questions of law and fact; every conceivable question. The State house or senate is just as sovereign in its jurisdiction as the Senate of the United States is sovereign in its jurisdiction with respect to judging those questions of fact and law, or of mixed law and fact.

The Senator from Oregon in the debate read from a case in Kansas which the learned Senator informed us had been decided by Judge Brewer, now a very distinguished member of the Supreme Court of the United States. I wish, now, with respect to this doctrine, to read also from the case in Kansas, and by a fortuitous coincidence it is a case decided by Judge Brewer. I may say, as the honorable Senator did, that he is a very distinguished justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He has acquired a new title to our regard as president of the Venezuelan Commission. I wish to read from his opinion about the nature of judgment as used by State legislatures, the power, the authority, the scope, the extent of it.

This was a case in which a member of the legislature was impeached for alleged drunkenness under a statute of the State of Kansas in an era of red-hot prohibitory legislation. The judge admits in the case that the member might be liable to impeachment under the section quoted, but he also says that he must be impeached in the house of which he is a member. He can not be impeached in any other court, and it is to the opinion and reasoning of the judge upon that subject that I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

The constitution declares, Article II, section 8—

That is, the constitution of Kansas—that "Each house shall be judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This is a grant of power, and constitutes each house the ultimate tribunal as to the qualifications of its own members. The two houses acting conjointly do not decide. Each house acts for itself and by itself, and from its decision there is no appeal, not even to the two houses. And this power is not exhausted when once it has been exercised and a member admitted to his seat.

That is the first adjudication, when a man's credentials are read and he is admitted to a seat. That is the first adjudication of the house upon credentials.

And this power is not exhausted when once it has been exercised and a member admitted to his seat. It is a continuous power.

This absolute power, this ultimate power of decision—

It is a continuous power, and runs through the entire term. At any time, and at all times during the term of office, each house is empowered to pass upon the present qualifications of its own members.

"The present qualifications," the qualifications of to-day, no matter how long the man has been here. Each house is authorized and qualified to pass upon the present qualifications of its own members.

By section 5 of the same article, acceptance of a Federal office vacates a member's seat. He ceases to be qualified, and of this the house is the judge. If it ousts a member on the claim that he has accepted a Federal office, no court or other tribunal can reinstate him. If it refuses to oust a member—

Although he holds a Federal office in direct contradiction to the constitution of his own State—

If it refuses to oust a member, his seat is beyond judicial challenge.

That would be a very great abuse of power in the legislature of Kansas. It would be a very great misuser; it would be a gross abortion of this great prerogative, but no power can challenge it.

This grant of power is, in its very nature (and so as to any other disqualification), exclusive; and it is necessary to preserve the entire independence of the two houses. Being a power exclusively vested in—it can not be granted away or transferred to any other tribunal or officer.

This was in the supreme court of Kansas, the highest court in that State. This case of Watson is in the Senate of the United States, the highest court in the Union; let me add, the highest court in the world. Not even to this supreme court of parliamentary decision can the question of the membership of a State legislature be transferred or delegated.

It may appoint a committee to examine and report, but the decision must be by the house itself. It, and it alone, can remove. Perhaps, also, it might delegate to a judge or other officer outside of its own body power to examine and report upon the qualifications of one of its members. But neither it nor the two houses together can abridge the power vested in each house separately of a final decision as to the qualifications of one of its members or transfer that power to any other tribunal or officer. And an act which purported to grant to the district court power to remove from office must be construed as not embracing members of the legislature; or if its language specifically names or necessarily includes them, then as to them the act is unconstitutional.

There is an unconvicted felon seated in the legislature of Kansas that the house may refuse to oust. Nobody else can oust him. He is a felon; he is simply unconvicted; this man in the case named was an unconvicted felon. I know the desire of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] for justice, his desire for right; but the jurisdiction of this Senate as a court can not be extended, nor can the jurisdiction of any State legislature be excluded by the desire of the Senator no matter how warm, how zealous, how well purposed, or disposed. What is needed is an amendment to the Constitution of the United States declaring that we shall not only be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of our own members, but of all the members of the legislatures who vote for the persons who sit here.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator a question for information? In the case to which he has just referred, what did the legislature of Kansas do in passing upon the question? What did they find? Does the case show that?

Mr. TURPIE. They found nothing.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Did they pass upon the question as to whether or not this alleged disability existed?

Mr. GRAY. They refused to pass upon it.

Mr. TURPIE. They refused to pass upon it, but allowed him to stay there and vote and act as a member.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It was an adjudication that the disability did not exist?

Mr. TURPIE. It was a constructive adjudication, not an actual one. When they found they could not unseat him in the house they brought a suit in the district court, that is, the inferior court of Kansas, and that court decided that he was not a member.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is where the case came up?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes; because he had taken a Federal office, violating his oath of office. Then it went to the supreme court and the supreme court decided that he was a member and nothing could unseat him as a member except a judgment of the house of which he was a member.

Now I come to the Kansas cases cited by the honorable and learned Senator from Oregon. I do not know that they have the most remote relation to the case in argument, but out of deference, as I said before, to the person in the presidency of our committee, and to the course he has given to this discussion, I shall notice the Kansas cases.

The first is that of a person who was elected State printer by the legislature of Kansas on joint ballot of that body. In that legislature at the time there were four senators in the senate who were admitted to the Kansas State senate and qualified and acted as such, three of whom voted for this person who claimed to be elected State printer without which 3 votes he could not have been elected. It seems from the facts stated by the judge in making his opinion that these four senators were elected from districts (the names are given) which were not entitled under the apportionment act of the State to elect or choose senators. They were entitled under a resolution of the senate. The court then goes on to say and decide that they were not members of the legislature, not entitled to vote for State printer, and this pretended State printer was not elected. They took jurisdiction of the case because these people were not members of the legislature, never had been, and never could be. To allow them to be considered as members of the legislature would be to allow the apportionment act of the State to be amended by a senate resolution—the resolution of one branch of the legislature. To allow such people as these to be considered as members of the legislature would be to allow that there could be a member of the legislature without any constituency authorized by law and without any seat subject to occupancy, to use a phrase very much used and very often repeated by the honorable and learned Senator from Oregon. Yes, there must be a seat subject to occupancy; there must be a constituency which is entitled to send a senator, and there must be a law creating the senatorial district authorizing the constituency to be represented. These are the elementary principles of parliamentary representation. None of them existed in this Kansas case and it is entirely foreign to any question in this case.

Now I pass on to the second Kansas case. A law was passed at the special session of the legislature called for some reason on some subject—I have forgotten the subject. In that case there were 4 members of the house of representatives who acted and voted as members of the house of representatives and they all 4 voted for this law. Without their votes it was no law; it could not have been passed. The constitution of Kansas provided at that time that the house of representatives should consist of 125 members. The 4 members who voted for this law, declared to be void, were supernumeraries; fictitious, spurious; they were there; they were recognized; they voted pro and con; but their presence made the house of representatives of Kansas to consist of 129 members, when under the constitution of the State there could be only 125 members of the house. The court had no trouble in disposing of that case, in claiming jurisdiction of it and deciding it. Why? Because these people had never been members of the house. There was, therefore, no adjudication and no action, no order, no resolution, no recognition of the house which could make them members. There were no seats for them in the house. No such seats existed. There were no constituencies; there were no districts. The whole thing was fabulous, fictitious. I do not see any difficulty in that case, in the decision of it, or in the reason of it, but I do see a good deal of difficulty in applying it to the case of Mr. Watson.

The legislature in the Kansas cases I have spoken of attempted to adjudge the rights of a person as a member when there were no seats subject to occupation. Now, this is involved in the case of election, that very ordinary phrase used, "Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." When the house judges of elections it judges of whether there are any seats subject to occupancy at the time the elections occur, but it can not increase the number beyond what the constitution provides, or beyond the district created by law because its adjudication in such case has no subject-matter.

This is decided by Judge Brewer in relation to a State printer, and concerning the validity of a law, but when the same judge came to decide the question directly of a member's seat and title he declined the jurisdiction as in the case already cited, and says that the house itself has the sole jurisdiction in such cases.

There are three things necessary to make a court. One is the judge, another is the plaintiff, another is the defendant. There are three things necessary to make a judgment in a case. One is the court, another is the parties, and another is the subject-matter to which the judgment applies. Where there is no seat there can be no judgment respecting a seat.

Then the Senator supposes a case where the State senator is 27. The constitution requires that he should be 30 years of age, and the record on its face shows that he is only 27, and yet he was seated. He asks can we revise this? He asks why we may not revise this; why can we not declare that he ought not to be seated and that he is not seated, that he was not seated; why can we not declare that the judgment of the house of representatives in such case in a State legislature was void, was null; why we do not act as a court of errors and correct the error, especially upon a question of mere fact? Why, sir, in such a case as the one put by the honorable Senator from Oregon, I assume that the error, the plain error, is gross, but that does not give a court or tribunal jurisdiction which has no power to hear and determine the case. The grossness of the error can not give jurisdiction to a tribunal which by law has none, and especially the grossness of the error can not give the power to judge where the power does not exist.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator does not wish to misstate my position I take it. I think the Senator misstates my position.

Mr. TURPIE. I do not think I have misstated it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Upon that point.

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I stated in giving that illustration that in the case of the Delaware constitution a person to be eligible to a seat in the State senate must be 27 years of age. I stated that if a person who was but 20 years of age should apply for a seat in the senate and the senate of the State of Delaware should pass upon the question of fact as to his age and admit a person who as a matter of fact was but 20 years of age and there was nothing on the record to show that fact in that case, the judgment of the Delaware senate would be conclusive upon the Senate of the United States, and we would have no power to inquire into that question of fact which had been determined by the Delaware senate, nothing appearing upon the face of the judgment to show that the court had no jurisdiction. But I stated furthermore if it should appear on the face of the judgment rendered by the senate that the person who was admitted was not 27 years of age, but was only 20 years of age——

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Let me get through.

Mr. TURPIE. No, I beg the Senator to allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That he was only 20 years of age——

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That fact appearing upon the face of the record, the United States Senate would not take——

Mr. TURPIE. I think the Senator ought to yield to me. He has interrupted me very frequently. Can I not interrupt him once?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly the Senator will allow me to finish my sentence. The Senator very kindly and courteously yielded to me to correct a statement of the Senator who was, as I thought, misrepresenting me.

Mr. TURPIE. No; I was not.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Not knowingly.

Mr. TURPIE. I do not admit any such thing, either knowingly or unknowingly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator was doing it, all the same.

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir; I was not, and I do not abate anything from the statement made. The Senator can make another if he wishes, but I adhere to the original statement made. He makes now two hypotheses very different.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is just what I stated in my speech.

Mr. TURPIE. They are wholly alien and foreign to the case before the Senate. I ought not to have noticed it at all; that was a mistake. One is favorable to the hypothesis which he entertained. A man was only 20, and the record did not show it. I did not say anything about that; but of the other branch of the hypothesis, where the man was 20, and the record did show that he was of constitutional age—that is the case I stated. The first, the worst case against our position, and the best case that the Senator took, I stated. I did not state the other. Is that any misstatement? Where a man undertakes to make a statement of a position taken by the honorable Senator from Oregon, must he state all his positions?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He should state all the elements that enter into the statement.

Mr. TURPIE. The elements are not at all material. I care nothing about your first case stated. That is a case which you say yourself and admit yourself we could not inquire into.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator, however, failed to state in the statement he made that it appeared on the face of the judgment that the man was but 20 years of age.

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir; I stated it with emphasis. It is the particular point I wish to make. I stated it then, I state it now. This person is a senator only 20 years of age. The constitution of Delaware requires that he shall be 30, but the journal shows that he is only 20. That is the statement I made originally.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Now the statement is correct.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; it was correct in the first instance. The Senator is not correcting it and can not correct it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Indiana has corrected it himself.

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir; I am not correcting it; I am simply repeating it. The last case is the one which I stated originally, where the journal of the senate contradicts the constitutional provision with respect to the age of a senator. I say that the judgment of the senate is just as binding in that case as it is in any other. There is no possible state of facts or of law which can give to the Senate of the United States jurisdiction to adjudge the rights of an individual member of a legislature, I do not care what they are. That is the position assigned to us under the Federal Constitution. Let us take it, live up to it, stand by it, go with it wherever it may lead us.

Mr. GRAY. That is what Judge Brewer says in the case the Senator read.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; he says the same in more eloquent language. This statement of mine, which I have committed to writing in pencil and which seems to grit like sawteeth upon the auditory nerves of the honorable Senator from Oregon, I shall take pleasure in repeating. I have got it here in pencil.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is right.

Mr. TURPIE. Supposing a case where a Senator by the constitution must be 30 years old, and the record shows on its face that he is only 20 (I am reading now just what I did before), yet he is seated, can we revise the judgment? No; we can not. The error is plain, gross, but this fact does not give a court or tribunal jurisdiction which has no power to hear and determine the question. The grossness of the error can not constitute such grant of power. Such error is irremedial. There is no remedy for it. It is an incurable error. It may be thought that such errors are very strange, but they are not. They are not common, but they are not uncommon. We have in the profession, sir, to which you and myself have so long devoted our attention, a book which is called Bigelow's Overruled Cases. It has a list of over a thousand cases, decisions of courts of last resort in the different States of the Union, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, cases in which there was an error in the judgment as delivered, cases in which the courts overruled their former decisions and corrected the error. Now, I ask what is the condition of one who has been adjudged against wrongfully in such a case as these thousand parties were. He is not relieved by the overruling; he is not reached in the ruling of a subsequent case not his own.

Mr. GEORGE. In another case.

Mr. TURPIE. In another case. He is not reached. There is no remedy. There is no redress. The best known volume in the profession shows that there are at least one thousand irremedial errors committed without corruption, and I might say without fault, by the highest courts of the country. It is not strange, it is not uncommon, that these State legislatures should occasionally commit an irremedial error, as I have no doubt they have and would in the case put by the Senator.

But what has all this to do, allow me to ask, with the question in argument? In the State of Delaware the apportionment of members of the legislature and the number of members of the legislature are both fixed in the constitution, the fundamental law of the State. In most States of the Union the number of members is fixed by an act of the legislature, and in most States of the Union the districts which elect are apportioned by an act of the legislature, but apportionment and the fixation of numbers in Delaware is made in the constitution. It was made there sixty years ago, and stands just as it was made. Delaware, like Gaul, is divided in three parts—Kent, Sussex, and Newcastle, three counties. Each county of the three counties is entitled to three senators. That is a constitutional provision; and each county is entitled to 7 representatives. That is a constitutional provision; and the whole number of members of the legislature is 30. That is a constitutional provision.

Now, with respect to the case of Watson, was there a seat subject to occupancy at the time of his election? Unquestionably there was a seat subject to occupancy, for the county of Kent was entitled to elect three senators, and it appears from the journal Mr. Watson was one of them. Of course, afterwards one of these seats may become vacant, but that does not assimilate to the doctrine of the Kansas cases. A vacant seat is yet a seat, just as an empty basket is a basket. There was a seat, then, subject to occupancy. There were seats subject to occupancy from the county of Kent, and eligible by the constituency of the county of Kent at the time when Mr. Watson was elected. He was not chosen from a district which was not in existence; he was not a supernumerary. He was not chosen by a constituency not authorized by law to send a senator. He was not a tenth senator, then, who would come within the Kansas rule, for under the constitution of the State there can be only nine. He was not a senator from the State at large, for that is no district. He represented a legitimate, lawful constituency, and it took him, with the other two gentlemen, to make up the three senators of which the delegation from Kent was composed, and to make up the nine senators of which the senate of this State was composed. There were seats subject to occupancy in the case of all those senators, and they voted and acted as members, without once being subjected even to the suspicion that they were there without seats behind them, or without having legitimate constituencies which had sent them.

The learned and honorable Senator from Oregon says that there may be a time in which the legislature of Delaware shall consist of 29 members. This hypothesis is put in such a purely cloudy and ethereal manner that I am inclined to admit it. There may be a time when the legislature of the State of Delaware may be composed of only 29 members; certainly there may be. Whenever the constitution of the State of Delaware is amended so that there shall be but 8 senators and 21 representatives, that time will come. That hypothesis is perfectly comprised within the limits of such time. But while the constitution of the State of Delaware remains as it is, providing for 9 senators and 21 members of the house of representatives, there can not, during that time, ever be a period when the legislature of the State of Delaware will be composed of less than thirty members. Some member may be absent; he may not attend; more than one—two or three—may be absent; but the composition of the body does not depend upon attendance or nonattendance. It depends upon the fundamental law of the State, fixing the number at 30. Without a change of the fundamental law of the State it could be no less and no more.

When a seat is filled by the election of a member, it is no longer subject to occupancy, and it can not become so unless by death, resignation, or adjudication, resolution or order of one of the houses, declaring it to be vacant by the expulsion, ouster, discharge, or dismissal of one of its members. The action, adjudication, and recognition of Mr. Watson as a senator was as to who should occupy a seat lawfully existing. It was therefore perfectly within the power of the legislature; they had full jurisdiction to decide whether he should occupy it or not. It binds the United State Senate as it binds all the world. The pretended action, judgment, and resignation in the Kansas case concerned the occupant of a seat which had no existence, and could have none; the thing likely never was, is not, and can not be. The adjudication, order, and recognition of the State senate as to its own members, for whom seats are by law created, is conclusive and exclusive; and Watson was such a member.

Sir, I wish to examine, as briefly as I can, the law of the United States Senate, the law of our own body upon this question. None of these questions are new; they have often been adjudicated, and the law is well settled. There is no feature of this case which presents a question which has not been repeatedly adjudicated by the Senate of the United States sitting as a court. The Senate of the United States has often adjudged, ordered, and decreed, as to two bodies, each claiming to be the lawful legislature of the State, which was the lawful legislature, and entitled to elect a United States Senator. That has been repeatedly the subject of judgment by the Senate. Again, the United States Senate has very often decided as to which of the two houses of a State legislature, each of which claimed to be the genuine house or the genuine senate, was in fact the genuine house or the lawful senate. That has been very often decided here; but the United States Senate has never decided, and has always refused to decide; it has never adjudged; it has always refused to take jurisdiction for the purpose of adjudging in any case as to the right of an individual member of a legislature to vote and act as such either in joint convention or elsewhere. The Senate of the United States has never adjudged in any case respecting such right of an individual member.

Sir, I refer to the case of Sykes against Spencer, decided in 1873, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some parts of the opinion delivered there.

Mr. HOAR. In what year was that?

Mr. TURPIE. In 1873. In Sykes against Spencer, page 521, Taft's Senate Election Cases, the following is the opinion of the majority:

> In the opinion of your committee it is not competent for the Senate to inquire as to the right of individual members to sit in a legislature which is conceded to have a quorum in both houses of legally elected members. But, undoubtedly, the Senate must always inquire whether the body which pretended to elect the Senator was the legislature of the State or not, because a Senator can only be elected by the legislature of a State.

I quote that in support of the position taken by me, that the Senate may lawfully adjudge, and always adjudge, as to which body, where a contest arose, was the genuine legislature; and I quote it also to show that, as to the right of an individual member to sit in the legislature, the committee is of the opinion "that it is not competent for the Senate to inquire." It is stronger than I had thought it was. I thought the opinion rendered by the committee was that it is not competent for the Senate to judge as to the right of individual members to sit in the legislature; but the text of the opinion, very celebrated and very fully discussed, never questioned since, is:

> In the opinion of your committee it is not competent for the Senate to inquire as to the right of individual members to sit in a legislature——

Mr. GRAY. And the Senate adopted the opinion of the committee in that case.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; they adopted the opinion in that case unanimously.

I now read from the minority opinion in the same case. This was an Alabama case:

> Each house of the general assembly of Alabama is the exclusive judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members, and any inquiry into such question by the Senate of the United States would be as unwarranted by precedent as it would prove dangerous in practice.

This case happened twenty-two years ago, and a committee of the Senate of the United States decided that the inquiry into the right of individual members to sit in the legislature was unwarranted by precedent; that there had been no precedent for such an inquiry. This body is now over one hundred years old, and in its whole history there is no precedent for an inquiry into the right or title of an individual member of a legislature; there had been no precedent for it at the time this report was made, which, as I say, was twenty-two years ago. I read further:

In a contest like the one now under consideration, between two persons elected to the Senate by different bodies, each claiming to be the legislature of the State, the Senate may look into the constitution and laws of the State to ascertain which of the two bodies, if either, has been organized in conformity with their provisions, but it can not rightfully inquire into the election returns and qualifications of the members of either body.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that the Sykes case?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; the case of Sykes against Spencer, decided in 1873, and found on page 521 of Taft's Senate Election Cases. They did decide between these two bodies, which was the legislature, and seated Senator Spencer accordingly.

But with respect to the question now in argument, this is what is decided, that—

It can not rightfully inquire into the election, returns, and qualifications of the members of either body.

Either the genuine body or the spurious body. They will not inquire about the right of individual members:

If the Senate could enter upon such inquiry, where would be the limitation upon its prerogatives?

The committee goes on with reasoning in support of its opinion:

Could it not as legitimately inquire into the manner in which any election officer had performed the duties of his office, and even into the qualification of the electors who had voted for members of the State legislature?

Certainly. If we once enter into the field of inquiry into the right and title of an individual member of the legislature, we shall have to take jurisdiction of the whole body of laws in the 45 States, and the duties of inspectors and judges of elections, and of the qualifications of the voters at the polls, in the first instance. Sir, we are not competent for such labor; we have no time for such labor; it is totally inconsistent with the duties of this body that it should ever be assumed. That is one of the reasons, one of the very smallest reasons, why this jurisdiction has never been assumed, why it is expressly forbidden and prohibited.

Take a similar case founded upon such hypotheses as those of the honorable and learned Senator from Oregon, founded upon supposed constructions of the constitution of the State of Delaware. We would have to acquaint ourselves and be familiar with the constitutions of the whole number of States in the Union, with the decisions of the supreme courts of those States upon constitutional provisions, with the first decisions and the later decisions, whether this one or that one had ever been overruled, questioned, or doubted. This would be a laborious duty for a court which had no other imposed upon it.

Mr. GRAY. May I make a suggestion there?

Mr. TURPIE. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana, by way of suggestion, whether, if the contention of the Senator from Oregon be admitted, that the judgment of the senate of Delaware in regard to Mr. Watson's seat is not final, exclusive, and binding upon this body, upon what reasoning or upon what philosophy is the finding or judgment of this body in regard to Mr. Du Pont's seat to be considered final, binding, and exclusive?

Mr. TURPIE. The finding or the judgment which we may make in this case is not at all conclusive except for the same reasons that the finding and judgment or order of the State senate of Delaware would be conclusive in a like case.

Mr. GRAY. And under a similar provision of the constitution of the State of Delaware and the Constitution of the United States in the same words.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. Making each house the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

That celebrated section of the Federal and State constitutions to which the Senator from Delaware has just alluded is a statute of peace, is a statute of repose. Its object is to make an end to controversies, and finally to determine and permanently finish questions with respect to the qualification, election, or return of any member of a legislative body within the United States. I think it is one of the most beneficent provisions in the Federal Constitution, as it is in the State constitution, that there should be such a finality provided, and that peace somewhere and the end of controversy somehow should be reached in such cases.

I read further from the opinion of the committee in the case of Sykes v. Spencer:

The undersigned would not restrict the Senate in its constitutional right to judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members, but would regret its assumption of powers belonging exclusively to the two houses of the State legislature. (Sykes v. Spencer, p. 528.)

I wish to put that opinion of the Senate, delivered twenty-two years ago, unquestioned, never doubted, against the opinion of the honorable and learned Senator from the State of Oregon.

The honorable and learned Senator from the State of Oregon said—he has said many things—that the legislature of the State, the State senate, or the State house of representatives, can judge only of questions of fact; that questions of law must be determined elsewhere. Mr. President, this committee of the United States Senate says—

Would regret its assumption of powers belonging exclusively to the two houses of the State legislature.

All other jurisdiction is excluded. I care not what may be the subject-matter of it, whether it be law, whether it be fact, or whether it be any other third element, it is excluded, shut out by the ordinance of each State providing that these qualifications, elections, and returns shall be solely adjudged by the members of the respective houses of each legislature. Their jurisdiction is sole. All the power, all the judgment, all the jurisdiction of any other tribunal is foreclosed; it is impossible; it is barred; and it never can lawfully enter.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me at that point, in order to test the question as to which of us is correct on the proposition as to whether or not the senate of the State of Delaware is to be the exclusive judge of the law bearing upon the qualifications of a person to sit, I wish to ask him a question. My question is this: The constitution of the State of Delaware, of course, undertakes to fix the number of persons who shall constitute the State senate. The Delaware constitution may fix it in terms, so that it is perfectly plain and there is no room for any misunderstanding as to the number. Then, again, the constitution might so phrase it as to leave the matter open to construction as to whether the Senate should consist of nine members or ten members. But suppose it to be plain—as it is in the case of Delaware, I admit—that the senate of the State shall consist of nine members, and suppose the Delaware senate declares that it shall consist of ten; in other words, the Delaware senate, in construing the constitution of the State of Delaware, construes it wrongly, as everybody will admit. The Senator from Indiana says that is a question which is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Delaware senate, and whether they construe the law right or construe it wrong the hands of the Senate of the United States are absolutely bound. To come back to my question, suppose in this case the Delaware senate should say that "the senate shall consist of ten members," and the constitution on its face, in clear and unequivocal terms, says "there shall be but nine," would the distinguished Senator from Indiana hold that the Senate of the United States was bound by that adjudication? If we are not bound by it, then we are not bound by it in a case where there is a question as to the construction; and here there is a question. We, upon this side, claim that pending the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker of the senate and one of the senators, the number of the senate of the State of Delaware shall be but eight, while the Senator from Indiana and the Senators on the other side say it shall consist of nine.

Mr. TURPIE. I decline to yield further, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana declines to further yield.

Mr. TURPIE. The Senator is just repeating for the thirtieth time the position which he took in his first argument I yielded to the Senator to ask a question. He asked it, and I think the Senator ought not to have gone beyond.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I beg pardon. I went perhaps a little further than I should have gone, but I should like to have an answer to the question.

Mr. TURPIE. I do not know whether I shall grant the pardon or not, but I will recommend that executive clemency be granted to the Senator. [Laughter.]

Now, I want to get at the question of the Senator. The only thing I regret is the waste of time in determining the philosophy of conundrums. The Senator seems to be infested with conundrums, and I told him yesterday we could not administer the Government in that way. I think the question is this: Supposing the constitution of Delaware as it is provides that there should be 9 members and the senate of Delaware should decide that they should have 10 members, the honorable Senator wants to know if the United States Senate would be bound by that adjudication.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is the question.

Mr. TURPIE. I do not think that question could come here. That is the Kansas cases stated over again. Where there is no subject-matter, there can be no adjudication, but we have no power to decide it. What was done in the Kansas case? If such a question were raised in the State of Delaware, there are many ways of deciding it, first, in the circuit, and then in the supreme court of that State. It never would become a Federal question at all, and never would come here as this court is not a court of errors in any case, and the reason that I am now taking this position in this case, and those who are acting with me, is this: You say you have raised the question. I admit it. You have been raising it for three or four days; I admit it, but it is the Senator from Oregon who is raising it here now. It is not raised by any action of the senate of Delaware, and could not be—their own action is final—if by the courts of Delaware, and it still remains without our jurisdiction.

The Senator from Oregon thinks that a small error in the State senate is binding, but a very gross error is not binding. There is no error large or small that we can revise.

The case of Sykes and Spencer was decided, as I said, in 1873. In that case no actual judgment or adjudication had taken place upon the contested cases of individual members subsequent to their admission, and the decision of the minority and the majority both rested upon the action and recognition of persons voting in the joint convention as members of either the senate or the house, and consequently of the legislature. There was no formal action or adjudication in the Sykes and Spencer case. The opinion of the committee was delivered upon the fact that they had acted and voted as members of the legislature, and that was taken to be a constructive adjudication of their right to do so; and that right having been exercised, the Senate of the United States would not inquire into or question the right of individual members to have acted as members of the joint convention.

In the next case which I wish to cite, there is an express adjudication, that is an Indiana case, usually called the Turpie case, decided here in May, 1888. In that case there was a contest in the State senate. One member was ousted and another member seated. That contest was sought to be transferred here. It was claimed that the member who was ousted had been lawfully elected, and that the member who was seated had been wrongfully seated; that he was a mere usurper; that the seat was taken away from the incumbent and given to another, merely for the purpose of electing a United States Senator. That is the remonstrance in the Turpie case. Of course it was not well founded, but that was the fact stated in that remonstrance. The United States Senate was asked not to decide, but to hear. This is what the committee unanimously reported in that case, a very able opinion by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts who sits near me [Mr. HOAR]:

> The committee are of the opinion that the facts offered, if proved, will not warrant the Senate in declaring the sitting member not entitled to his seat. There can be no doubt that the body in question was the constitutional senate of Indiana.
> The journals of both houses of the legislature of the State have been submitted to us. It appears that the body was recognized as the senate by the governor and by the house of representatives. Statutes to which its constitutional assent was necessary were enacted and have become part of the law of the State.
> We also think that the judgment of the senate of Indiana as to the title of Messrs. Branahan and McDonald, the two members in question, to their seats is binding upon the Senate of the United States. This body is made by the Constitution the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members. The senate of Indiana is likewise the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. We must determine all questions arising out of the proceedings of the electors. But who sustain the characters of electors is to be determined by the legislative body of the State.

Now, where, upon the hypothesis of the remonstrance in that case, could there be such circumstances and facts more imperiously demanding relief? Here was one person lawfully elected and sitting in actual occupancy of his seat, and another, who they claimed not to have been elected at all, was given that seat and the lawful incumbent ousted for the express purpose of affecting the election of a person as a member of this body. Where shall relief be given if not in such a case? If relief was refused in that case where shall we grant it? Was there ever a more monstrous case, violative of every principle of morality, of propriety, than this case as made, than this case as given? Yet the Senate of the United States decided that they would not inquire into that judgment. I read further:

> We can not inquire into the motives which control its judgment. In rendering that judgment, whether it shall give a hearing to parties, permit debate, examine witnesses, act upon evidence or without evidence, are matters within its own discretion. If that discretion were exercised in the manner charged by the remonstrance, a majority think that a public crime was committed, for which the offenders are responsible to the people of Indiana. But we can not try the question.

Now, the impossible and imposing dilemmas of the learned and honorable Senator from Oregon, these gigantic conundrums with which he has interrupted the deliberations of the court in the conduct of this case, these most fanciful, dreamy, cloudy reveries which he has made public upon so many occasions, are any of them crimes? Do they approach the dignity of offenses, or even misdemeanors? But here is a case where it is said that if the legislature adjudged as stated they committed a crime. No fable, no fiction, but a high crime, a misdemeanor against the people of a sovereign State; but it is also said that we, the Senate, will not inquire into the same, just as Gallio, after hearing the criminations and recriminations of the Jews before him, "cared for none of those things." The Senate can not care for them. It is not our province; it has not been made our concern. We have no jurisdiction either of crime or of misdemeanor or of incompatibility, or of any of the things stated or imagined or all of them, not because the senate of Delaware may have passed upon them or may not have passed upon them, whether they have passed upon them or not, we have in either case no power to pass upon them. Here there was an adjudication, a very harsh adjudication, a cruel, unfeeling adjudication under the case made. Yet the Senate of the United States is bound by that adjudication no matter how wrongful.

What is the imaginary case stated by the honorable and learned Senator from Oregon about a man being 20 years of age when he ought to be 30 and about the representation from a county being 9 when it ought to be 10? What are any of those things compared to this crime, this felony in the case put here committed against the franchises of the people of Indiana? Can we not inquire into this? No, the Senate of the United States is not a court of errors; it is not a criminal court of appeals; it has no jurisdiction in such cases.

I ought to say, by way of explanation, perhaps, as to what I related about the member of the House of Commons who had been sentenced by penal judgment and was afterwards seated there, that at the time it was not officially known that the judgment existed. As soon as it was known the House expelled him by an order and judgment.

When a member of a legislative body presents his credentials and is sworn in and seated, his title to membership is absolute, and continues until the records of the house of which he is a member show that he has been disqualified, that he is not entitled to a seat there further, or that some other person is entitled thereto. Such an entrance into a deliberative body, such an admission upon credentials, has all the effect of a formal adjudication. It is a judgment by confession.

The honorable and learned Senator is always talking about adjudication, as if it included a trial and hearing. There are judgments rendered without trial and without hearing. A judgment by confession is just as binding as any other sort of a judgment, and when a member is introduced into this body, carrying in his hand credentials which are placed on file, and he is sworn in and is admitted and takes his seat, that is a judgment by confession in his favor against all claimants and all challengers of his right. It is a solemn admission of every member of the Senate, of every member of the body, that he is a fellow-member, and entitled to all its franchises, privileges, and functions.

Now, sir, I wish to read something, because I have not in the whole course of this argument taken a single position which is not supported by the written opinions and judgment of this body, this court. I wish to cite another case, that of Clark and Maginnis against Sanders and Power, page 637 of Taft's Election Cases:

> The majority of persons having a right to seats in the House of Representatives—

This was concerning a seat in the house of representatives in the State of Montana, and there was a question between two sets of people as to which had the right to be considered as representatives in that house, and consequently which had the right to vote for United States Senators. This is the opinion:

> The majority of persons having a right to seats in the house of representatives have a right to organize that house and to transact all its lawful business, including the enactment of laws and the election of Senators. Persons who have the certificates of election have such right to seats.

The possession of credentials carries with it the right to a seat unless it is questioned.

> Every act of the assembly in which they take part, and to which their consent is necessary, has as absolute validity as if their title had been affirmed by an adjudication of the house itself.

That is the position which I have just taken. The moment a member is admitted on his credentials, that is as formal as if an adjudication had been made in the case.

> Their title is not—

The opinion of the Senate goes on to say—

> as is sometimes carelessly said, a prima facie title. It is an absolute title, continuing until the house itself has adjudicated that some other person be admitted to their place.

That is another written decision in favor of my position. It is not only an absolute adjudication—this admission upon credential—but it is a continuous adjudication, and keeps the title and functions of the representative or senator alive until there has been an adverse action or adjudication by the house of which he is a member.

> This adjudication—that is, an adjudication made adverse to a member after he has been seated—> is only operative for the future, and has no retroactive effect whatever. When the house makes the inquiry on the merits, it may treat the credentials as prima facie evidence upon that question. But until the house tries the case the credential is conclusive to all the world.

It is "conclusive ot all the world." The Senate of the United States is a very great body, but it is comprised, I think, in that expression. It is a part of the world, and what concludes all the world must conclude us. The credential of a member of a State legislature, whether of the senate or of the house, concludes the Senate of the United States. It not only concludes it for the day he is admitted, but it continues to conclude us. It is an adjudication continuous. It continues until there has been an adverse action by the house of which he is a member. Then the authority of that adjudication ceases.

Now, sir, I wish for a moment to call the attention of Senators to the credentials of William T. Watson, one of the senators from the county of Kent in the State of Delaware, and I will ask the Secretary at the desk to read the credentials with the signatures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF DELAWARE, Kent County, ss:

Be it remembered that at the general election held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, for Kent County, according to the constitution and laws of the State of Delaware, William T. Watson was duly chosen senator for said county in the general assembly, which is manifest by calculating and ascertaining the aggregate amount of the votes given for each person voted for, according to the provision made by law in this behalf.

In testimony whereof we, the sheriff of the said county and the inspectors of the several hundreds and election districts of said county, who have this day met and ascertained the state of the said election throughout the said county, as the law requires, have hereunto set our hands, at the court-house in said county, on Thursday, the tenth day of November, being the Thursday next succeeding the day of the election aforesaid in the year aforesaid.

Amos Cole, sheriff; J. C. Stockly, inspector for eastern election district of Duck Creek Hundred; Samuel J. Reynolds, inspector forwestern election district of Duck Creek Hundred; R. E. Carsons, inspector for Little Creek Hundred; John F. Bell, inspector for Kenton Hundred; Edward R. Knotts, inspector for election district No. 1 of East Dover Hundred; James A. Kerin, inspector for election district No. 2 of East Dover Hundred; Charles A. Garton, inspector for third election district of East Dover Hundred; Alfred G. Sturdevant, inspector for West Dover Hundred; William R. Postles, inspector for eastern election district of North Murderkill Hundred; George W. Walheater, inspector for west election district of North Murderkill Hundred; Robert H. Sipple, inspector for election district No. 1 of South Murderkill Hundred; George C. Mason, inspector for election district No. 2 of South Murderkill Hundred; Nathan F. Raughley, inspector for election district No. 1 of Mispillion Hundred, J. R. K. Miller, inspector for election district No. 2 of Mispillion Hundred; Luther F. Cubbage, inspector for eastern election district of Milford Hundred; William A. Truitt, inspector for western election district of Milford Hundred.

Mr. TURPIE. That certificate is accompanied by the certificates of judges, of the officers and judges, so as to make it evidence under the act of Congress. I wish to offer the credentials as evidence of the fact that Mr. William T. Watson was admitted and sworn in as a member of the State senate upon such papers, unobjected to and not protested against.

I offer at the same time an extract from the journal of the State senate of Delaware, which I will read in connection with this credential and having direct relation to it. This is the record:

By the returns of the officers of Kent County, appointed by law judges of election, it appeared that on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November last, at the several and respective places appointed by law for holding the election in and for said county, Thomas T. Lacey was duly chosen to represent the said county in the senate of the State of Delaware to fill out the unexpired term of the late John W. Hall, terminating on the first Tuesday of January, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five; and also that William T. Watson was duly chosen to represent the said county in the senate of the State of Delaware for the ensuing term of four years.

That is the record of the qualification, of the election, and the return of Senator Watson in that body. It is a judgment. It shows that he has all the functions of a State senator and that the term for which he was elected was four years. The election was held in November, 1892, and his term will expire in November, 1896. He was then and is now and will continue to be a senator from the county of Kent, in the State of Delaware, unless the journal shows in some other place, on some other page, and under some other title that he has been disqualified, that his seat has been vacated, that he has been ousted or expelled. That does not depend upon our resolution. It does not depend upon any argument about the constitutional point, nor about the existence of any constitutional point. It depends upon whether there is upon such point—the one stated here, or the ten stated here, or any point stated here—any order, resolution, or judgment of the State senate of Delaware.

Mr. HOAR. Does not the same journal show that somebody else was elected speaker pro tempore because this man had become governor?

Mr. TURPIE. It shows that some person else was elected speaker pro tempore.

Mr. HOAR. Because Mr. Watson had become governor?

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir; it does not say because he was governor

Mr. HOAR. I did not know. I only asked for information.

Mr. TURPIE. This shows that somebody else was elected speaker pro tempore. But it is a constitutional provision that somebody else shall be elected speaker pro tempore. It does not show any effect as to the gubernatorial function devolving upon him as speaker of the senate. There is no effect given to that in the journal. That is a constitutional question. You take one ground of it; I take the other; and I do not care which side you take nor what side I take, unless there be an order or resolution of the State senate of Delaware in that journal upon that question, his seat remains unquestioned and unchallenged until November, 1896.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. TURPIE. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. With the permission of the Senator from Indiana, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 11, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 10, 1896.

POSTMASTERS.

Scott W. Carney, to be postmaster at Downs, in the county of Osborne and State of Kansas.

George R. Fitzsimmons, to be postmaster at Reading, in the county of Hillsdale and State of Michigan.

Ferris S. Fitch, to be postmaster at Pontiac, in the county of Oakland and State of Michigan.

Robert M. Todd, to be postmaster at Halstead, in the county of Harvey and State of Kansas.

Joseph M. Young, to be postmaster at London, in the county of Laurel and State of Kentucky.

Martin V. B. Smith, to be postmaster at Morrison, in the county of Whiteside and State of Illinois.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 10, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEATH PENALTY.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the death penalty may be inflicted.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder or of rape under sections 5339 or 5345, Revised Statutes, the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto "without capital punishment"; and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life.

SEC. 2. That except offenses mentioned in sections 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, when a person is convicted of any offense to which the punishment of death is now specifically affixed by the laws of the United States, he shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life, and when any person is convicted of an offense to which the punishment of death, or a lesser punishment, in the discretion of the court, is affixed, the maximum punishment shall be imprisonment at hard labor for life.

SEC. 3. That the punishment of death prescribed for any offense specified by the statutes of the United States, except in sections 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, is hereby abolished, and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall apply to, or in any way affect, any proceeding or indictment now found or pending or that may be found for any offense committed before the passage of this act, and all offenses committed before the passage of this act shall be punished under the laws then in force: Provided, That juries may return qualified verdicts in such cases according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, and the sentences shall be imposed as therein provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, before consent is given, I wish to ask a question of the gentleman. Is this to do away with capital punishment under the statutes of the United States?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Only in nineteen offenses.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman explain the cases? I withhold my objection for an explanation.

Mr. SAYERS. It is understood that the objection is reserved?

The SPEAKER. Objection is reserved.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 878 was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House and is in the same language in which a similar bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate in the last Congress.

In the Fifty-third Congress a bill was introduced defining murder in the first and second degrees. The Committee on the Judiciary unanimously reported it and it passed the House of Representatives. While pending in the Senate, the Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Olney, was of the opinion that murder should not be defined as of the first and second degrees, and members of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate were also of the opinion that as the practice of the Federal courts is that of the common law, it was not advisable to introduce the question of definition into the statutes, and that it was preferable to repeal such sections prescribing capital punishment for offenses which the committee thought it desirable to have abolished.

In view of that fact, it was the unanimous sentiment of the committee of the Senate that the bill should be reconstructed so as to take out the penalty of death without changing definitions. The bill failed of consideration in the Senate, because of the objection of one Senator who wished to discuss it, and therefore objected to its consideration. Had it been considered, there is no question but that it would have passed the Senate and that the amendments would have been concurred in by the House.

In this Congress the bill was introduced in the same language it was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate in the last Congress. It leaves the sections of the law relating to the administration of justice in the Army and in the Navy as they now are. They are section 1342 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing articles of war for the government of the Army, and section 1624, prescribing articles of war for the government of the Navy.

This bill takes out of the statute the authority of United States consuls to inflict the punishment of death upon citizens of the United States, or those who may serve under the flag of the United States, in those countries where Congress has authorized (section 4102) consuls to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction. It also takes out of the statutes of the United States the death penalty as prescribed for sixteen offenses for which we have had no convictions or executions for more than ninety years.

In respect to the crimes of murder and rape it preserves the death penalty, but it permits, as is provided in the State of Louisiana in express terms and in many other States in principle, that the jury may, in bringing in their verdict, decide whether capital punishment shall be inflicted or not by allowing the jury to add the words "without capital punishment" to their verdict. If that clause is added, the court will sentence the accused to imprisonment for life; and if there is no recommendation, then the death penalty will be inflicted, as now provided for those crimes. On page 1 of the report on this bill (Report No. 108) will be found a communication from Mr. S. Taliaferro, United States district attorney for the eastern district of Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. Before the gentleman proceeds to read that communication, I should like to know from him whether, where robbery is attempted and death follows, this bill modifies the punishment inflicted?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Wherever death follows the death penalty may be inflicted, as I understand. The matter has been carefully reviewed by the Committees on the Judiciary of the House and Senate and the Department of Justice.

Mr. SAYERS. In the case which I mention is the death penalty preserved, without reduction to a lighter punishment?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The bill allows the reduction of the penalty in every case. The jury decide in each case.

The letter from the district attorney for the eastern district of Texas, in urging the passage of this bill, is in the following language:

PARIS, TEX., December 23, 1895.

SIR: While in Washington in July last I requested the Attorney-General to have introduced and passed by this Congress a bill amending the law as to murder. He inclosed me a copy of bill introduced by you designed for this purpose, which permits the jury to return a qualified verdict finding the party guilty of murder, but "without capital punishment." This bill, in my judgment, covers the question very fully, and I trust very earnestly you will have it passed as soon as possible. I have on the docket of this court for trial at the next term, commencing in April, 73 murder cases, where parties are either in jail or under bond. In many of these cases the facts will not permit the court to submit the question of manslaughter to the jury, and the only question to be determined will be that of murder, which is now punishable only by death, and the severity of the penalty in many cases, where the parties are undoubtedly guilty and should be punished, prevents the juries from either reaching a verdict or leads them to acquit the defendant.

I hope you will succeed in passing the bill at the present term, as it is very necessary to the administration of justice in this court. If you think it will be of any assistance to you, it will afford me great pleasure to write the Texas delegation in Congress and urge them to lend you their help.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

S. TALIAFERRO,
United States Attorney.

Hon. N. M. CURTIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

In a communication addressed to me by the same gentleman on the 3d day of this month, which I will read, he refers to that letter, and urges the importance of the passage of this measure in the following language:

GALVESTON, TEX., March 3, 1896.

SIR: I herewith inclose you a copy of the printed calendar showing criminal cases to be tried at the April term, A. D. 1896, of United States circuit and district courts at Paris, Tex.

As heretofore stated to you in my letter of December 23, 1895, in many of these cases the defendants, because of the commission of the crimes, as well as for the protection of society, should undoubtedly be punished, but after the examination of the cases I am prepared to say that in but comparatively few of them will the facts justify the court in submitting to the jury the question of manslaughter. Therefore the only proposition which will be submitted to the jury will be, Is the defendant guilty of murder? As this offense under the United States laws is now punishable only by death, and as in many of these cases there will be circumstances which will weigh upon the mind of the jury to prevent the verdict of murder, I can only expect, in many instances, hung juries or acquittals. I therefore write to urge that you will do all in your power to have passed and have put in operation, prior to the 6th day of April next, the bill introduced by you entitled "A bill to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted."

I know of no amendment of the criminal law of the United States which will have so deterring an effect upon the criminal classes of the Indian Territory as the one presented by your measure. These criminals are fully aware of the fact that juries, except in extreme cases, are very loath to see the death penalty inflicted, and the whole strength of the defense is usually directed for the purpose of obtaining some witness or witnesses who will testify to some fact which will lead the jury to conclude that the death penalty should not be inflicted. If they can secure such testimony, the result, of course, always is either a hung jury or an acquittal of the defendant.

Having a thorough knowledge of the practical working of the law as it at present is, and appreciating the great benefits which will result from the passage of the bill introduced by you, I most earnestly request that you urge Congress to take action in the matter at once.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

S. TALIAFERRO,
United States Attorney.

Hon. N. M. CURTIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

That letter I took to the Department of Justice and met the Attorney-General just as he was about to take a carriage to leave the city. He expressed his hearty approval of the measure, as he has heretofore done in communications upon the subject addressed to me, and sent to the Solicitor-General a memorandum expressing his views upon the bill in the following words:

The passage of this bill, H. R. No. 878, will promote the administration of justice, and I recommend its speedy enactment.

HOLMES CONRAD,
Acting Attorney-General.

I am sorry, I frankly say, that this is not a bill totally abolishing capital punishment. I wish it did contain such a provision and that the House could give it sober consideration and give it its approval. The bill as it stands simply provides that the courts of the United States may administer justice and may impose some penalty for the great crime of murder, which is done now in but few instances. In the United States at large murders have been increasing and executions have been decreasing, so that in the last year we have had less than 2 per cent of the persons indicted for murder convicted and executed. This measure has the approval of many of the high judicial officers of the Government, many of the district attorneys, and has the hearty approval of the Department of Justice, on the ground that it is desirable to punish crime and protect the lives of the innocent. If other explanations are desired, I shall be glad to make them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. ADAMS. I object.

DIVORCE.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, H. R. 5217, making one year's residence in a Territory a prerequisite to obtaining a divorce there.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no divorce shall be granted in any Territory for a cause which occurred elsewhere, unless the party applying for the divorce shall have resided in the Territory for one year next preceding the application.

An amendment recommended by the committee, inserting the word "continuously" after the word "resided," in line 5, was adopted.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I think that in fairness to the House, I ought to say just a word by way of explanation. In the report of the committee I made inadvertently a misstatement of fact, which I wish to correct. The report says that there is but one State in which a year's residence is not now required as a prerequisite to divorce. It should say that there is but one State in which only three months' residence is required. There are also five States in which only six months' residence is required. I simply want to make that correction to set myself right before the House. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN FINN.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 227) to authorize the Auditor for the War Department to audit certain quartermaster's vouchers alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Auditor for the War Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo., claimant of 371 quartermaster's vouchers, aggregating $6,363.95, more or less, to sign the receipts upon the said vouchers, which said vouchers it is alleged were presented by the said Finn to the Quartermaster-General, and are now alleged to be in the office of the Auditor for the War Department; and the receipts so signed shall be accepted as a sufficient compliance with the laws and rules regulating such cases: Provided, That it shall be found, upon examination, that the said vouchers were duly issued by the legally constituted authorities and came rightfully and for value into the hands of said

Finn and that they have not heretofore been audited and paid: Provided further, That all original payees who do not present claims for payment on said vouchers within thirty days from the date of approval of this act shall be forever barred from presenting such claim, and said John Finn shall after said thirty days be entitled to receive the amounts found to be due thereon upon the conditions aforesaid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Let the report be read, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object.

The report (by Mr. COX) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 227) for the relief of John Finn, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report the same with the recommendation that it pass.

The Senate report on this bill (No. 79, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session) fully sets forth the facts, and your committee adopt the same and make it a part of this report.

Your committee further recommend that the bill H. R. 1281, on the same subject, lie on the table.

[Senate Report No. 79, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 227) entitled "A bill to permit the withdrawal of certain papers and the signing of certain receipts by John Finn or his attorney," having had the same under consideration, beg to submit the following report:

The substitute herewith recommended by your committee passed both Houses of Congress at the last session, but failed to reach the President in time for his signature. Based on reports heretofore made in favor of this claim, notably Senate Report No. 690, Fifty-third Congress, second session, your committee report back the bill S. 227 with the following amendments, and with said amendments recommend its passage:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Auditor for the War Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo., claimant of 371 quartermaster's vouchers, aggregating $6,363.95, more or less, to sign the receipts upon the said vouchers, which said vouchers it is alleged were presented by the said Finn to the Quartermaster-General and are now alleged to be in the office of the Auditor for the War Department; and the receipts so signed shall be accepted as a sufficient compliance with the laws and rules regulating such cases: Provided, That it shall be found, upon examination, that the said vouchers were duly issued by the legally constituted authorities and came rightfully and for value into the hands of said Finn, and that they have not heretofore been audited and paid: Provided further, That all original payees who do not present claims for payment on said vouchers within thirty days from the date of approval of this act shall be forever barred from presenting such claim, and said John Finn shall after said thirty days be entitled to receive the amounts found to be due thereon upon the conditions aforesaid."

Amend the title of the bill so as to read as follows:

"A bill to authorize the Auditor for the War Department to audit certain quartermaster's vouchers alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo."

Mr. CANNON. I have heard the report, and I am just as wise as I was before it was read.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that this bill was up for consideration in the last Congress, and was thoroughly discussed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and others, and was unanimously passed. These vouchers of the quartermaster came into Mr. Finn's possession from other citizens. The vouchers were exchanged for goods, and some of them were imperfectly transferred; and hence the quartermaster would not pay them. The matter has been thoroughly investigated by the Department, and it has been found that the goods were furnished and that Mr. Finn is entitled to his money.

Mr. CANNON. Why were they not paid?

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Because there was an imperfection in the transfer. The people who furnished these supplies to the Quartermaster's Department received the vouchers and gave them to him for goods and money; and they were not all properly transferred.

Mr. CANNON. When were they issued?

Mr. COBB of Missouri. I do not know when they were issued; some time during the war, or immediately after the war, when the troops were in possession of the States, or during hostilities.

Mr. CANNON. I see the gentleman bars the men to whom they were issued unless they present their claim within thirty days.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. They will never present them. These claims were paid for by Mr. Finn in exchange for goods, and came into his possession in that way. Some of them were imperfectly transferred, and hence the quartermaster would not pay them.

Mr. CANNON. This comes from a committee of the House?

Mr. COBB of Missouri. It comes from the Committee on Claims, and has passed the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. Is there a favorable report from the Committee on Claims of the House?

Mr. COBB of Missouri. There is a unanimous report.

Mr. CANNON. Who is the chairman of that committee?

Mr. JOY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MAHON.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will not object. I have been through it thoroughly, and am satisfied it is a just claim.

Mr. CANNON. I have a great deal of confidence in the gentleman from Missouri, and would like to accommodate him personally; but it is the first time I have ever known a bill to be passed on account of what the report did not contain.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. I think the report explains the matter.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the House that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COBB] was recognized to call up this bill in the last Congress and I stopped it, and after a careful investigation I came to the conclusion that the bill ought to pass, and did not object when he was recognized again to call up the bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is familiar with it and has gone through it?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And there is no question of disloyalty in it?

Mr. SAYERS. I think not.

Mr. CANNON. Has it been passed on by the Quartermaster-General and rejected?

Mr. COBB of Missouri. No, sir; it never has been rejected.

Mr. CANNON. It is not of that class of claims?

Mr. COBB of Missouri. And it has been acknowledged to be a just claim.

Mr. CANNON. And if the bill passes it would have to go to the accounting officers to be certified for appropriation, or there is an appropriation made available?

Mr. SAYERS. The appropriation was available in the bill that passed last Congress, but I do not know whether it is in this.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. It carries no appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COBB of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

W. J. KOUNTZ.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3715) for the relief of Capt. W. J. Kountz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to release and discharge Capt. W. J. Kountz from charges aggregating $22,845.51, resulting from a contract dated the 12th day of March, 1878, between the said Capt. W. J. Kountz and the quartermaster's department of the United States Army at St. Paul, Minn., for the transportation of troops and supplies on the Yellowstone River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad if the gentleman would give some explanation, as this is quite a large claim.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, this grows out of a contract made between the Government and Captain Kountz in 1878. The contract required him to transport supplies for the Army on the Yellowstone River, between one point and another, covering a distance of 306 miles. He had his boats ready to transport the supplies; but, owing to the delay of Congress in passing the appropriation bill, the supplies were not ready for shipment until the water had fallen in the river, in June and July, to such an extent that he simply could not do it by river transportation, and under a provision in the contract the quartermaster hired wagons and transported the supplies by wagon, and then turned around and charged the cost of that transportation up to Captain Kountz. The quartermaster himself certifies that the fault was not with Captain Kountz, because he had his boats ready to transport the supplies, and it was wholly the fault of the delay in not getting the supplies ready until after the water went down. It is simply to relieve him from that charge that the bill is reported. This bill has been reported from the Committee on Claims in every one of the last six Congresses. It does not carry any money at all.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman why the Government has never proceeded in this case, and what is the object sought to be obtained by the bill?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the report contains several extracts from reports of quartermasters and other officials, reciting the fact that it was wholly impossible for Captain Kountz to transport these supplies by river, and it has been recognized as such a hard case that the Government has never collected the money. I do not know of any special reason other than that.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Why were not the goods transported before this difficulty arose from the condition of the river?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The Government could not buy the supplies until the money was appropriated for them, and therefore could not get them ready earlier for shipment.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Did the Government have to make the purchase?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Then this man only transported them?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. I do not know that I shall object at this late day to relieving this gentleman. I had supposed that possibly he might now have become wealthy, and the Government might be able to collect this claim. But according to this report this gentleman agreed in his contract to deliver these supplies during the months of May, June, July, and later—the great bulk of them in the month of July, at which time the river was so low that he could not make the delivery. He perhaps simply made a mistake; perhaps when he bid for the transportation of the goods he anticipated that the river might be high at that time. Unfortunately the river was low. Still he knew when he took the contract that he must transport these five million and odd pounds during the month of July and a great many pounds during the months of August and September. That is in the gentleman's own report.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I know that. Still the man ought to be relieved. Perhaps he was unwise in making the contract; but this is not the first time that persons have been relieved from the consequences of their mistakes. The Government has not suffered anything in the matter, and will not suffer. The bill has been reported favorably by every committee that has acted on it during the last six Congresses. But the difficulty has been to reach it on the Calendar. It does not carry an appropriation.

Mr. DINGLEY. While the bill does not carry any appropriation, yet as a matter of fact does it not impose an additional charge of $22,000 upon the Treasury?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not so understand.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Here is a charge against this man of $22,000, from which this bill seeks simply to relieve him. The amount has never been collected.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the Government has paid out $22,000 on account of this contractor, and it has the right to enforce payment against him, having done for him the work which he ought to have done. The bill certainly imposes $22,000 additional liability on the Government.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not so understand.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The Government has never collected anything on account of this claim, and never will.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania puts the claim on that ground, that the contractor is not good for anything, and that the money can not be collected, that puts the question in another form.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The Government has not been able to collect it during the last sixteen or eighteen years.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me clear that while the bill carries no appropriation, yet its passage will waive a claim of the Government to the amount of $22,000 and thereby impose that much additional liability upon the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We could not hear the answer which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made just now to the gentleman from Maine. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania say that this claimant is insolvent and the claim is not good?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I can not speak by the book as to that. I can only say that the claim has never been collected.

Mr. DINGLEY. Did not the contractor give bonds for the performance of his contract?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I suppose he did.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has there been any inquiry by the War Department to ascertain whether that bond is good?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I presume so. The committee has made some inquiries in connection with this case which the report does not fully set forth.

Mr. DINGLEY. I observe that there are no references in the report to any official information.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. This bill may relieve a charge against this man on the books, but there is no money appropriated by the bill; it will not result in an appropriation.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that; but the bill will release an obligation of this contractor to the Government for $22,000.

Mr. COX. When the Government transported these supplies the cost to the Government was a little over $22,000; and that sum has been charged up against the contractor. Of course, if he is allowed credit to that amount, it relieves him to that extent.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If the gentleman desires the report read, that can be done.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have glanced over the report; but I think it contains no facts in addition to those which have been stated by the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The quartermasters and all the other officers concerned join in saying that there was no fault on the part of this man and that he ought to be relieved.

Mr. LOUD. This is an old report; the case has been handed down from year to year. I remember that it came under my observation when I was on the Committee on Claims. I never thought that it had any special merit. But I do not feel like objecting to the case. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is so persistent and fascinating that I can not do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Thanks!

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 3, on page 4, after the word "rental," the words "or purchase."

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Seventeenth. For inland mail transportation, namely: Inland transportation by star routes, including temporary service to newly established offices, $5,354,000.

Mr. PICKLER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 10, page 4, add:

"Provided, That the postmasters of all newly established offices and other offices supplied with mail under the provisions of this paragraph shall, where their compensation was during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, less than $50 per annum, receive 50 per cent additional to their present salary for the year ending June 30, 1897, and those receiving more than $50 and less than $100 shall receive 25 per cent additional salary, and the postmasters of newly established offices so supplied shall receive a salary proportionately the same in accordance with the business done."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I must raise the question of order on that amendment. It has no reference to this paragraph, and is contrary to existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order unless the gentleman from South Dakota desires to be heard.

Mr. PICKLER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair, if he will observe the language of this provision, will find that it appropriates a certain sum of money, including also "temporary service" in newly established post-offices. The amendment relates to the newly established post-offices. The amendment prescribes what the officers at newly established post-offices and other postmasters at similar offices supplied with mail by this service shall receive as their compensation, and it seems to me that it ought to be admissible under the rule.

In this connection, I would like to have read a letter that I have just received bearing upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has simply heard the gentleman on the question of order.

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman from California will reserve his point of order for a few moments and allow this letter to be read——

Mr. LOUD. I will reserve the point of order. The gentleman has not spoken on this question, I believe.

Mr. PICKLER. I have a letter which I received this morning from a postmaster in the State of West Virginia, and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from California while it is being read. It shows that virtue is its own reward. A few of us have been trying to stand by these fourth-class postmasters, and I commend this letter to the attention of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the communication sent up by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The Clerk read as follows:

A LETTER FROM A WEST VIRGINIA POSTMASTER.

MARCH 9, 1896.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to thank you, Mr. HEPBURN, and others for your noble defense of "fourth-class postmasters," (of whom I am one).

Every word you say is emphatically true.

I have been postmaster here for many years. 'Tis a central point, and as far as I know no one else wants the office, and I might add there is no other place, all things considered, exactly suitable.

I receive much more mail than any half dozen perhaps, and it is to my interest to have the mail properly cared for, else I could not tolerate the present arrangement.

For instance, I have, for four months in the year, the mail bag to open and letters to assort six times every day except Sunday, and on that day twice; the remainder of the year, four times each day.

For all this, and for the furnishing of a room, desk, etc., and for my constant attendance—for I never think of leaving the house for fifteen minutes, except to go to church on Sunday—my compensation for the whole of last year was $87.57.

The Hon. Mr. LOUD says we retain all we receive. What a feeble argument for a great mind!

And even when receiving this pittance I was interrogated by the Department why it was that in one of my "quarterly returns" my cancellations exceeded by a trifle the stamps sold, making an indirect attack upon my honesty. To be scrutinized and impugned is as much as one can bear when thousands are justly realized.

The additional $20 a year spoken of would be very acceptable. By adding $20 to that amount I would get some one to assist and relieve me a portion of the time.

Surely no reasonable gentleman who knows whereof he speaks will oppose that.

I have been reading with deep interest the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (kindly sent me by our Representative, Mr. S. S. TURNER), and find nothing in it that interests me more than the matter referred to except the war in Cuba.

Hoping you will excuse me for the liberty I have taken, I am, yours, gratefully,

——— ———.

Hon. Mr. PICKLER.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from California—and I think this will probably be my last appeal to him, because I am quite certain that it will be a successful one this time—I hope the gentleman from California in charge of the bill, in view of the fact that this paragraph appropriates $5,354,000 to this service, will withdraw his point of order and allow the amendment, which will involve an expenditure of a mere bagatelle, to be adopted. It simply provides that these fourth-class postmasters, when they receive less than $50 a year, shall get an increase of 50 per cent on their present compensation, which means an addition of $25 dollars a year salary, and that those who receive between fifty and one hundred dollars shall receive $25 more.

As this postmaster whose letter I have caused to be read says, the mail is opened six times a day except on Sunday, and then it is opened twice a day. You can well understand the time that it takes a man to attend to this work, and yet for all of this service this man received last year only $87.57 for his services.

I do not think the gentleman, and I say this in all candor, should object to this slight increase. It seems to me that the point of order, at all events, is not well taken, because under this paragraph which provides for new offices supplied with the mail for which payment is provided in this paragraph of the bill, the compensation of the postmasters could properly be fixed by a provision appended here.

I hope, however, that the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order. It will not affect this bill, because by reference to page 12, line 15, of the bill you will find it is provided that any deficiencies in the revenue of the Post-Office Department may be drawn from the Treasury.

Now, this is a very small amount, but it touches a large number of people. It simply does an act of justice, and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order. It seems to come properly and naturally under this paragraph of the bill, and I think that the slightest consideration of the question will convince anybody of the justice of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. LOUD. I am compelled, Mr. Chairman, to insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "dollars" on page 4, line 10, as follows: "Hereafter no contract for carrying the mail on routes known as star routes shall be let to any person or persons other than actual bona fide residents of the State or States through which said mail routes, or a part thereof, run or extend."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against that amendment. It is a change of existing law.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed to correct an evil now existing in the letting of contracts for the star-route service. The adoption of this amendment, I believe, will result in more efficient service for the people of this country who are dependent upon star-route service. Under the prevailing system the practice is for a syndicate to bid for this star-route service, and as a rule the contract is let to them. They virtually discourage competition. Their bids are usually accepted, and when accepted they sublet these routes to contractors in the remote parts of the country where the star routes exist. They let them at such rates that the people are unable to carry the mails properly, and hence the star-route service is impaired in that section.

This amendment limits the letting of contracts to persons residing in the States in which these routes exist. It provides that only those persons shall be contractors who reside within the States where the routes or parts of routes exist. Persons residing in the vicinity are acquainted with the topography of the country, its physical conditions, and are better able to know what to bid. I believe this will lessen the cost to the Government if this amendment is adopted, and I know it will improve the service and be a benefit to the people who are served by it.

Mr. DINGLEY. This would be a very important change of existing law. Whether it would be a wise change or not, of course we can not very well determine in this way, in the discussion of an appropriation bill. It certainly would largely increase the cost of this star-route service.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. In what way?

Mr. DINGLEY. If there is to be any legislation on this subject it should be carefully prepared, more carefully than a hasty amendment to an appropriation bill can be.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. In what way would the adoption of this amendment increase the expense?

Mr. DINGLEY. It would undoubtedly increase it. Everyone knows that. Contracts are awarded under the present system to the lowest responsible bidder, whether residing out of the State or in the State in which the star route lies. Therefore this amendment, which provides that the bid of a person residing in the State must be accepted notwithstanding the bid of a person outside of the State is lower, must inevitably increase the expense.

I can see some advantages growing out of confining these contracts to bidders within the State where the route lies, and yet I can see a probable great increase of expense. If there is to be any legislation in that direction, I should prefer to have it carefully considered in a bill properly considered and not legislated upon an appropriation bill. I do not like hurried legislation upon appropriation bills, and hence I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Do you not think you ought to insist upon the efficiency of the service?

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the matter be properly considered by the appropriate committee and be carefully investigated in all its parts, and not thrown in hastily to be adopted here after five minutes' consideration, when we can not know all the facts.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. May I inquire what existing law this changes?

Mr. DINGLEY. Obviously it changes existing law or the gentleman would not offer his amendment. The existing law, as the gentleman is very well aware, is that the contract shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, whether he lives in the State or not. The law is easily referred to, if the gentleman wishes to have it produced. The gentleman's amendment proposes to prohibit the awarding of the contract to the lowest bidder, provided he does not live in the State where the route lies.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman desires the law, it is easily read to him. It is a very well defined law, and is as follows:

ADVERTISEMENT OF MAIL LETTINGS.

SEC. 750. Notice of mail lettings; how given.—That before making any contract for inland mail transportation, other than by railroads and steamboats, except for temporary service, as provided for in (sections 767, 768, 769) an act approved August 11, 1876, amendatory of subsections 246 and 251 of section 12 of an act approved June 23, 1874, the Postmaster-General shall cause to be published, in not exceeding 10 newspapers published in the State or Territory in which such service is to be let, one of which shall be published at the seat of government of such State or Territory, once a week for six consecutive weeks preceding the time of letting, a notice in displayed type, not to exceed 6 inches of space in one column of a newspaper, of the following purport:

MAIL LETTINGS—NOTICE TO CONTRACTORS.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., ———, 18—.

Proposals will be received at the contract office of this Department until — a. m. of ——— ———, 18—, for carrying the mails of the United States upon the routes, and according to the schedule of arrival and departure, specified by the Department, in the State (or Territory) of ———, from ———, 18—, to ———, 18—. Lists of routes, with schedules of arrivals and departures, instructions to bidders, with forms for contracts and bonds, and all other necessary information, will be furnished upon application to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

———,
Postmaster-General.

And no other advertisement of miscellaneous lettings shall be required: Provided, That said contracts for mail letting shall not take place in less than sixty days after the first publication. (Act of May 17, 1878, section 1, 20 Statutes, 61.)

Then it goes on to give the form of the contract and the proposal, and then it says "the Postmaster-General shall in each case"——

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman admits that the point of order is good.

Mr. BINGHAM. This is the Revised Statutes, 3941, and part of the act of March 1, 1881, and section 874. The whole detail is gone into. It simply opens to competition the bidding for all star-route service.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I admit the point of order can be made, but I did not think it well that it should be interposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eighteenth. For inland transportation by steamboat routes, $400,000.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph, not the one just read, but the one just before that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words in lines 9 and 10 on page 4: "five million three hundred and fifty-four thousand," and insert "six million."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, we had passed that proviso.

Mr. McRAE. We had just passed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas rose when the Clerk had read the paragraph.

Mr. LOUD. We had passed the steamboat proviso, and were about entering upon the messenger service.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists upon the point of order, the Chair will be obliged to sustain it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nineteenth. For mail-messenger service, $1,130,000.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "dollars," on page 4, line 14, the words, "and the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, use not exceeding the sum of $35,000 of this amount for experimenting in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tube or other similar devices."

Mr. BROMWELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, that amendment is offered at the suggestion——

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BROMWELL. This amendment is offered at the suggestion of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. The provision which it is intended to insert in the nineteenth paragraph will follow the word "dollars," in line 16, twenty-fourth paragraph, and in that connection, with the permission of the House, I will read a portion of a letter addressed by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to the chairman of the committee, requesting a transfer of that item from the twentieth paragraph to the nineteenth.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will permit me, we have come to the proviso in the bill which I desire to transpose right at this point.

Mr. BROMWELL. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. The amendment I propose to offer transfers this proviso in the twentieth section to the nineteenth section.

Mr. BROMWELL. My amendment is of the same effect as the amendment of the chairman of the committee, but it also increases the amount from $25,000, provided in line 18, in the twentieth paragraph, to $35,000. It not merely transposes the sentence from the twentieth paragraph to the nineteenth, but also increases the amount to $35,000.

Mr. LOUD. That is so.

Mr. BROMWELL. And in connection with that I would like to read a portion of the letter which was addressed by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to the chairman of the committee:

The following sentence of the same paragraph, relating to pneumatic tubes, should, in my judgment, be omitted from this paragraph and inserted in paragraph 19, immediately after the word "dollars," so that it may be paid out of the mail-messenger fund rather than out of this fund; and I would suggest an additional allowance of $10,000. In other words, that paragraph 19 should read:

"For mail-messenger service, $1,130,000; and the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, use not exceeding the sum of $35,000 of this amount for experimenting in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices."

I make this suggestion based upon information received and an investigation made by a committee composed of experienced postal men since my conversation with you, showing the possibility of an immediate adoption of important lines of tubing which would relieve us of a corresponding amount of expense for mail-messenger service.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. Is this legislation with reference to pneumatic transportation new legislation?

Mr. BROMWELL. I am under the impression that it is not, but the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads can probably give you the information. I think that experiments have been made with these pneumatic devices before, and they have been provided for in former bills. The chairman of the committee can probably give you definite information as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to interpose a point of order against this, if it is to be considered here. I was waiting until we should reach the paragraph in the bill. This is a proposition to transfer from the twentieth paragraph to the nineteenth.

Mr. BROMWELL. Oh, no. The amendment proposed merely adds to the nineteenth paragraph that which is in the other paragraph. If this amendment is adopted, we will move to strike out the sentence in the twentieth paragraph.

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point of order that this is new legislation—so much of it as reads:

And the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, use not exceeding the sum of $25,000 of this amount for experimenting in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tube or other similar devices.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order against this new language.

Mr. PICKLER. I must make it against this paragraph now, because it is proposed to transfer it to the nineteenth paragraph.

Mr. BROMWELL. As I have said, I do not know whether I have correct information in regard to this, and I would like to have the chairman of the committee state whether or not this proposition has been carried in former bills?

Mr. LOUD. There have been similar provisions in former appropriation bills. I was engaged in conversation with gentlemen here and may have been derelict in noticing what was done, and did not ask to make this change; but I will now ask that these two paragraphs be passed over, because they are so closely intertwined. I had proposed to take one and put it into the other, and one of the items depends upon the adoption of the electric-car service.

We have made a reduction in regulation screen or other wagon service of $70,000, and if the electric-car service item be not adopted, we will ask to return and increase this item. I therefore ask unanimous consent that paragraphs 19 and 20 be passed over until we shall have dealt with the electric-car service item.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the paragraphs will be passed over.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I promised the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] that I would make a brief explanation in relation to the item to which he proposed to offer an amendment when I raised the point of order. I will state that while the item for inland transportation for star routes appears to be less than the amount of the estimate, nevertheless we give every dollar that the Department asks for that purpose. After submitting the estimate they reduced the amount by $200,000. We took from that service $570,000, which the Department said they had been using for regulation wagon service, and put it into the other item, because we thought the items should be segregated, so that in fact we gave every dollar that they asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twenty-sixth. For railway post-office clerks, $7,639,000, of which sum not to exceed $15,000 may be used to pay necessary traveling expenses of chief clerks and railway postal clerks traveling on duty under order of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "six," on line 17, page 5, and inserting the word "seven."

Mr. BROMWELL. The effect of that amendment will be to increase the appropriation provided for in the twenty-sixth paragraph $100,000. I offered the amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who says:

Referring to paragraph 26, the sum recommended by the committee for railway postal clerks is $100,000 less than our estimate. The estimate was based on the probable percentage of increase, which is less than the actual increase thus far in the current fiscal year has proved to be. The probable annual rate of expenditure for this class of service on the first of the next fiscal year is $7,485,000; and even if the entire amount of our estimate is appropriated, this would leave us only $254,000 for increased service during the next fiscal year, which is a very small amount for the extension of service and additional help on lines where the mails are increasing in quantity, for the promotion of clerks who are entitled to advancement by reason of the termination of the probationary period for which they are appointed, for the development of the service of the suburban lines, and for the extension of the scheme of preparing mails in transit for immediate city delivery. Therefore it seems to this office a matter of special importance that the full sum estimated for the item of railway postal clerks be allowed.

Mr. PICKLER. I will ask the gentleman whether the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have concluded their deliberations on the bill to increase the salaries of the railway mail clerks?

Mr. BROMWELL. I will reply to the gentleman that we have ordered the bill on that subject, which was referred to the committee, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. PICKLER. Does your amendment now offered contemplate any advance for that purpose if that bill should become a law?

Mr. BROMWELL. It does not. As I stated the other day, this appropriation bill has come in ahead of the time when it should have been presented. The bill for the reorganization of the railway postal clerk service should have been acted upon by the House before this appropriation bill came in. If that bill passes the House it will add to this item $1,043,000, which is not provided for in any way in this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I think that Railway Mail Service bill ought to pass, and I hope the committee will see that it comes up for consideration.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I am a little surprised at the position taken by my colleague on the committee [Mr. BROMWELL]. This is the first time I have heard of any objection to this item, which was very carefully considered in committee. Of course the Department asks for the hundred thousand dollars additional. There never was a Government official who did not, as a rule, want all that he thought he could possibly use in his Department, but in this instance we have allowed $306,000 additional to what is carried in the appropriation bill for the present fiscal year. In certain portions of this bill we did take off amounts of money because we thought the amounts estimated for were too great an increase, and I think that the fair judgment of any gentleman upon this floor will lead him to assume that in the Railway Mail Service for the fiscal year 1897 $306,000 is a sufficient increase to meet the growth of the service. Hence, I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of paragraph 26, line 21, after the word "general," insert:
"Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall request of all railway companies carrying mail under contract or otherwise transportation for railway postal clerks to and from the termini of their respective runs to their homes when on the line of such railway."

Mr. LOUD. I will reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, members of this House who served in the last Congress will recall the fact that after a very bitter fight the House succeeded in practically abolishing an order made by the Post-Office Department requiring railway mail clerks to move onto the line of their runs by May 1, 1895. Through the efforts of certain members of the House an amendment was incorporated in the Post-Office appropriation bill practically abolishing that order and railway clerks not residing upon the line of their runs were allowed to continue to live at their previous places of residence.

Now, in order to defeat this act of the Fifty-third Congress, the Postmaster-General immediately demanded of all the railway postal clerks in the United States that they return the transportation which had been previously obtained by the Post-Office Department from the several railroad companies and given to the railway mail clerks. The result is that the railway postal clerks have been required to pay their transportation or railroad fare from the termini of their runs to their homes or else to move upon the line of their runs. In this way the Post-Office Department has in effect carried out the order which the Fifty-third Congress said should not be enforced. I trust the chairman of the committee will not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. I suggest to the gentleman that his proposition is farther reaching than he may possibly anticipate. Does he assume that if I were a postal clerk, with Washington as the terminus of my run, and should take up my residence in Baltimore, going there every night and coming back in the morning, the Government should pay my transportation daily because I find it agreeable to live over there?

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; I do not. And this proposition does not contemplate anything of that kind.

Mr. LOUD. Substantially it does.

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; it does not. The gentleman from California, the chairman of the committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, was, I remember distinctly, very active and earnest in his opposition to that order which required the railway mail clerks to move onto the lines of their runs, and it was due largely to his efforts as a member of the conference committee that the amendment I have referred to was retained in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes. I do not believe in compelling any man to live at any place which he does not find agreeable or convenient; but I do not think the Department should pay a man transportation because he chooses to live somewhere else than on the line of his run.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Department will not be required to pay the transportation of these clerks. The only object of the amendment is to require the Postmaster-General to request the railroad companies carrying the mails to furnish these men transportation free of charge. The railroad companies are perfectly willing to do it. There is no railroad company in the United States that is not willing to carry these men free. Their transportation was taken from them by the Postmaster-General, not by the railroad companies.

Mr. LOUD. I have heard that statement made before; but I am not in possession of the facts.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am in possession of the facts. I have seen letters addressed to the railway postal clerks requiring them to return their transportation.

This will cost the Government nothing, while it will enable men who live beyond the terminus of their runs to get to their homes without paying traveling expenses.

The Department has gone so far, in order to defeat the action of the Fifty-third Congress, as to compel these clerks to ride in coaches; it has gone so far as to deny railway mail clerks the privilege of riding in the cars of the company except when actually on duty, the Department evidently fearing that without some regulation of this kind the purpose of the Department might be defeated and the clerks be enabled to get to their homes without paying transportation.

I will add to the amendment, if it will satisfy the chairman of the committee, the words "without expense to the Government." Let the words be inserted wherever they will be proper. This is simply a direction to the Postmaster-General to request transportation from the railroad companies.

Mr. LOUD. I understand that; but I do not believe we should put a great officer of the Government in the position of asking a favor from the railroad companies. I believe we should stand upon our rights.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman knows that the Postmaster-General for a great many years followed that practice. He always did until the Fifty-third Congress repudiated an order which he had made requiring railway postal clerks to move onto the lines of their runs.

Mr. LOUD. If I were in possession of official information that the course stated by the gentleman had been pursued, I might possibly accept some proposition for adjusting this matter. But this amendment is in such a shape that I do not think it advisable to accept it at the present time. The matter can be attended to, if necessary, at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman consent that this matter be passed over for the present until it can be further considered?

Mr. LOUD. We can not get any information until to-morrow, I suppose.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not suppose the bill can be disposed of to-day.

Mr. LOUD. I insist on the point of order. The matter can be attended to, if necessary, at the other end of the Capitol.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twenty-seventh. For transportation of mail by electric and cable cars on routes not exceeding 20 miles in length, $150,000: Provided, That——

Mr. PICKLER. I want to interpose a point of order (I do not know whether this is the right place to do so) against all these provisions beginning with this paragraph, paragraph 27, on page 5, and extending through pages 6 and 7 and down to line 13 of page 8. I desire to make a point of order against these provisions as being new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not read the proposition, but will ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads if it is a new proposition.

Mr. LOUD. I will be very frank, Mr. Chairman, and will say that in my opinion one portion of the proviso may possibly be subject to the point of order, but that part which has been read is not subject to it. It is really divisible into two parts and one part could stand without the other, and if the gentleman will reserve his point of order, I will endeavor to explain the full intent of the provisions.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not particular about that. I only desire to reserve my right. I will reserve the point of order on the parts I have suggested.

Mr. LOUD. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I would like to explain the motives that actuated the committee in the preparation of this portion of the bill. This is a very important proposition, and I would like the attention of the committee for a few moments.

As regards the first proposition, it is a bare, naked proposition, which, standing by itself, could not possibly be subject to the point of order; that is that the Government now has power under the general law to direct the transmission of its mails by such means as it may select. I think no man will successfully deny that proposition or undertake to deny it. It has been the practice for many years and is unquestioned.

We have, as a matter of fact, been carrying the mails under the rulings of the Attorney-General's Department for some time by means of electric and cable cars. The only new proposition, then, is the one, or the paragraphs of the one, following the appropriation. Possibly the proviso, which covers two pages, may be stricken out on the point of order; in fact, I would be willing to admit that it is subject to the point of order, if it be insisted upon. But the question that the House is to determine is as to whether the electric-car service and the cable-car service shall be continued under such special regulations as the Department may prescribe, or whether in future you shall prescribe the limit—the maximum amount of money to pay for the transportation of the mails in this manner.

The Department, after a long investigation, has found serious difficulty in entering into contracts with the street railway companies in various cities, because in one city they want two or three times as much as in another, and hence, as I have said, they have very serious difficulties in instituting this service in some of the cities. In view of these facts it has been suggested with great force by the Department that Congress should fix a maximum limit to which all of these roads should be confined, and that provision is incorporated in the various paragraphs of the proviso here, which, if adopted, will enable the Department without difficulty to enter into these contracts, and I may say that it is just the same proviso as is inserted in the general law with regard to the transportation on the steam railroads.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota that, while by raising his point of order he may strike out the last portion of this provision, which provides the maximum limit to be paid to the railroad companies, he can not, I presume, strike out the provision itself, because there is abundant provision under existing law to authorize the transmission of the mails on the street cars if the Post-Office Department shall so desire.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps the point of order had better be disposed of first. Does the gentleman from South Dakota desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to say only, Mr. Chairman, that this is clearly new legislation on an appropriation bill, and the gentleman in charge of the bill admits it himself. It provides—

For the transportation of the mails by cable and electric cars on routes not exceeding 20 miles in length, $150,000.

Now, this provision can not be separated from what follows in the shape of a proviso. I do not agree with the gentleman when he says it can be separated. I think not. It is all one and the same proposition. It goes on with a proviso descriptive of the manner in which this money shall be expended, and runs down through all of the letters by paragraphs from a to h inclusive. It is one single proposition, and, besides, there is no such provision as this in the law. It is entirely new legislation from the very beginning, providing that the Postmaster-General shall have power to contract for the mail service on electric and cable car routes not exceeding 20 miles in length, and so on. as to how he may make these contracts. That is all a new provision. There is nothing in the law to warrant it, and the proposition is out of order on this bill. I do not suppose it will be disputed that such is the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman in charge of this bill states that the general law authorizes the Post-Office authorities to transport the mails on any kind of car. Does the gentleman from South Dakota dispute that proposition?

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know whether that is so or not. But I do not think there is any law authorizing the transportation of mail on electric cars.

Mr. BINGHAM. They have authority now on the electric lines.

Mr. PICKLER. Then why do you want any legislation on that point?

The CHAIRMAN. This is simply the appropriation for the purpose of paying for the service, not the authorization of the service itself.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if there has been heretofore such an appropriation?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know that there has been such an appropriation before, but the service has been carried on.

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir; there is no appropriation for it and no authority for it.

Now, what does this propose? That the Postmaster-General is authorized to transport the mails by electric or cable cars, and a fund is provided for the expenditure. There is no such provision in the general law. Nothing of the kind has ever been done before, and following that we have a number of provisions here in the following pages which specify how this money may be spent.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a limitation on the appropriation, that is all.

Mr. PICKLER. It is new legislation all the same.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow me to make a statement, I will submit that in all the large cities of this country to-day a United States mail car is run as the rear car on some of the trains of electric street cars. Perhaps the gentleman has observed such a car on Pennsylvania avenue. The transportation of the mail by what is called the trolley-car system is paid for out of the inland mail transportation fund. The Department is now doing that. They can continue under the general law. But the Post-Office Department has determined this as a system of wise, economical policy——

Mr. PICKLER. Determined what?

Mr. BINGHAM. The details of this bill. They are putting on these cars the same force as they put on in the Railway Mail Service for the distribution of matter. This simply limits the allowance that the Department is willing to pay for the transportation of these electric cars. For distances over 20 miles they pay under the general statute. In this proposed legislation there is a lower limit, because the cars are smaller and the service is less. It is simply a limitation under the general statute, wherein the appropriation is made under inland mail transportation. That is all there is in it.

Mr. PICKLER. This is, then, restricting the powers of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. BINGHAM. In lines of economy.

Mr. PICKLER. But it is restricting his power.

Mr. BINGHAM. If he did not have this restriction he would have to pay the full price. It is a limitation in expenditure under the general law.

Mr. PICKLER. That is just what I contended, Mr. Chairman, that it changes existing law.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman objects to economy in the administration of the Department, all right.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that under existing law the Postmaster-General could not avail himself of the provisions as they are set forth here. The gentleman admits that it is a change of existing law. It is a change in the powers of the Postmaster-General. That is what the gentleman has said in so many words. Therefore, it is a change in existing law. It changes the powers of the Postmaster-General in regard to electric cars and electric-car service. The gentleman confesses my whole contention.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is simply a limitation.

Mr. PICKLER. I insist that it is new legislation, that it has no place on an appropriation bill, and it ought to take the same course as the bills for the payment of railway mail clerks and the bills for the payment of fourth-class postmasters and for rural free delivery. It has no place on an appropriation bill, as the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]—but especially the gentleman from Pennsylvania—concede. It confers different powers so far as the Postmaster-General is concerned. It gives him different power than he had here before. I insist upon my point of order, that it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair holds that the paragraph down to the word "Provided" is not subject to the point of order; that the point of order is not well taken on the language down to the word "Provided."

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out that section, down to "Provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. Division. [Pending the count.] I withdraw the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand is withdrawn. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. BROMWELL. I call for the reading of my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out line 24——

Mr. PICKLER. It is understood that my point is pending to that—the balance of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will raise the point of order as we proceed with each paragraph. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out in line 24, page 5, the words "one hundred and fifty" and insert the words "two hundred."

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I do so in reference to the provision which we will have to pass upon in the paragraph marked H, on page 8, and commencing with the words "And provided further," on the eighth line of that page. I call attention to it now, through this amendment, so that when these paragraphs are passed, or if the paragraph should go out of the bill on a point of order, the provision contained in that section marked H, on page 8, may be covered with the necessary increase in the amount of the appropriation provided for generally in section 27; and in that connection I wish to read again from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

Twenty-seventh. For transportation of mail by electric and cable cars on routes not exceeding 20 miles in length, $150,000. The estimates for this service were made very carefully, and it is believed that the $200,000 is an absolute necessity and that the service can not be performed without that amount of money with which to carry it on; in addition to which the estimates for other branches of the service were cut down from the natural increases that would occur under the ordinary circumstances because of this service. A curtailing of this important branch of the service will necessitate an increased expense in the wagon service, and I would particularly request that the original amount be granted, that is, the $200,000 in place of the $150,000.

We now, however, beg to call your attention to the most important feature of this item, which is on page 8, beginning at line 8, reading "And provided further, That all street-railway companies carrying mails under the foregoing provisions shall furnish free transportation to letter carriers to and from the post-office and their respective routes, when such distance shall exceed one-half of a mile, as the Postmaster-General may direct." Permit me to state that the $200,000 asked for has been clearly demonstrated to cover only the necessities for moving the mails—that is, the space provided by the street-railway companies, or the special car that is provided, and the transportation of the weight and the clerks handling the mail. This item covers only new and additional service and service that they have never rendered or contemplated rendering before. However, you gentlemen have included in this item (which you reduced to $150,000) a service that the street-car companies are now rendering and receiving at the rate of $163,387 per year for—that is, the transportation of letter carriers, etc.—under certain conditions.

I beg to state that the passage of this bill, as it now stands, upon the above showing, will absolutely not only stop any additional service of this class, but will also wipe out of existence that which we have already inaugurated, because it is not possible to expect people to take $13,387 less per annum and furnish double the service. If the service which is now in operation should be abandoned, which was contemplated to be covered by the $200,000, it will necessitate a greater expense, or at least an equal expense, being incurred by wagon service being substituted for it, while the estimates for the wagon service, as explained to you, were made less, expecting the additional money which is provided for in the request for the $200,000. I am also satisfied that to abandon this service and to return to the former wagon service would create a great amount of dissatisfaction in the communities where the changes have already been made and a disappointment to those who are waiting for improved facilities in their cities.

Yours, respectfully,

C. NEILSON,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

In other words, we propose by this bill——

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. How does it come that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads brings in a report for $150,000 with such a letter as that?

Mr. BROMWELL. This letter, as I have said before, was received before this appropriation bill came in and before it ought to have come in here.

Mr. PICKLER. Whose fault is that?

Mr. BROMWELL. I have no comment to make on the action of the committee of which I am a member. I was not personally responsible for it.

Mr. PICKLER. It is certainly not the fault of the House.

Mr. BROMWELL. It is not my fault as a member of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I am somewhat surprised that the opposition should come from our committee. I understand that, of course, we can all get letters from heads of Departments asking for increased appropriations. I know that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General does not want this item to go in in its present shape. We thought it advisable to recommend for the electric-car system this year $150,000. We thought that was a reasonable amount to start with for this year under the present conditions, and the proviso put upon that bill, permit me to say, is what was practiced by the street-railroad companies of this country almost unanimously until two years ago. They do it in my own city now, where we are ridden and burdened down by the octopus, a great monopoly; nevertheless they carry the letter carriers free out to their routes, and I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that if this provision be enacted into laws when Congress has once enunciated this policy and principle, that the street-railroad companies of the country would gladly and willingly accept the provisions of this act.

We did have to adopt the suggestions of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in relation to maximum rates without being in possession of the proper information, for it would have taken months and months of investigation to ascertain what would be a proper rate. Some of the street-car companies' representatives have come to me and said that they could not carry the mails for these rates, but the maximum rate under the bill is equal to the rate allowed to the steam railroads for hauling a 40-foot car, and I believe that these street-railroad companies can afford to haul one of these little cars that they hitch on to the end of a train as cheaply as the great steam railroads haul a 40-foot car full of mail; and I believe further that if this proviso be once enacted into law it will settle this vexed question of dealing out car tickets to the mail carriers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PICKLER. As the Chair has held this provision to be in order, it seems to me almost ridiculous to appropriate only $150,000. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, says that this is positively against his judgment, and, as I understand, it is against the judgment of other members of the commttee.

Mr. LOUD. What right has the gentleman to understand that?

Mr. PICKLER. I understand that the chairman of the committee arbitrarily cut down this item, as he did others, in the face of the opposition of members of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not. Some of your committee——

Mr. LOUD. Whoever gives you that information informs you of that which is false.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, that is what I understand. I understand that not only on this item, but on others, the gentleman arbitrarily bore his committee down—that he did it on several of these items. He wants to cut this appropriation down to $150,000 in the face of the Postmaster-General's recommendation, and he does not adduce one fact in reply to the reasons given by the Department. All he says is that he believes that this will be sufficient and that it will cut off tickets to mail carriers. Where are his facts and his evidence? It seems to me that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] is right, and the letter which he reads makes it clear beyond peradventure that this service will be entirely crippled unless we appropriate the amount asked for by the Postmaster-General. The chairman of the committee adduces no facts in support of his view, but simply says, "I believe."

Mr. LOUD. I would ask the gentleman what motive prompts him to try now to increase this appropriation, which he has used every means in his power to strike out?

Mr. PICKLER. Just this. I still think it is out of order notwithstanding the opinion of the Chair; but if this item is to remain in the bill I want it to be of some service. The chairman of the committee undertakes to justify his view by adducing as an argument a comparison between the charge for hauling one of these street postal cars 2, or 3, or 5, or at most not to exceed 20 miles and the charge of a steam railway for hauling a car on a run of a thousand miles, and he thinks both can be done for the same rate.

That is the way the gentleman calculates and reasons upon this subject. My opinion is that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] is right. My opinion is that the Postmaster-General is right. If the Department has been paying $163,000 for this service, and if it is true that the service is required to be doubled, it seems to me it would be ridiculous to cut down the appropriation to $150,000.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is mistaken again. They have not used any such amount of money as $163,000.

Mr. PICKLER. It is proposed to double the service, as I understand from the gentleman from Ohio, a member of the committee, and still to require these railroads to do the work for $13,000 less than they received last year. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that if this item is to remain in the bill it ought to be made serviceable and of some effect, and I think this House ought to pay some regard to the recommendations of the Postmaster-General on this subject. The gentleman from Ohio, a member of the committee, has asserted on this floor that this bill has been brought in prematurely, that it has not been digested, but has been brought here in advance of some other matters that are pending before the committee. I take it as a verity that the gentleman from Ohio knows what he is talking about and that the Postmaster-General knows what he is talking about, and I repeat that if we are to adopt this item at all I believe we ought to make it effective. Unless we do that, let us strike it out.

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I desire to say that the gentleman from South Dakota travels entirely out of the record in making the statement he has made in regard to the action of that committee and of the chairman of the committee. His statement is entirely untrue and unjustifiable.

Mr. PICKLER. I can prove it by the members of the committee themselves.

Mr. OGDEN. No, sir; you can not. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. PICKLER. By more than one of them, too.

Mr. OGDEN. I am a member of that committee, and I state, in regard to what the gentleman has said about the arbitrary action of the chairman of the committee, that no such arbitrary action has ever been taken in the committee, at least while I have been a member. On the contrary, the chairman has been fair. He has had his own views in regard to what would be a proper appropriation bill to bring into the House, and he has presented those views to the committee, but in no instance has any such arbitrary action been taken as the gentleman from South Dakota states, and I repudiate all such charges against the chairman of the committee and against the committee as absolutely false.

The question being taken on the amendment, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) The Postmaster-General is authorized and directed to adjust the compensation to be paid for the transportation of mails on electric-car and cable-car routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that this paragraph seems to be connected with and conditioned upon the following paragraphs. The Chair therefore thinks that the point of order should be taken at the end of the whole proposition. It will be in time then.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) For full railway post-office cars, to be used for postal purposes only, to be operated independently of other cars, and to be not less than 16 feet in length, inside measurement, not to exceed 12 cents per mile traveled.

(c) For compartment post-office cars, to be operated independently of other cars, the compartment used for postal purposes to be not less than 10 feet in length, inside measurement, and full width of car, or not less than 13 feet in length and 5 feet in width, inside measurement, not to exceed 7 cents per mile traveled.

(d) For trailer post-office cars, to be run with regular passenger cars, and to provide space for postal purposes not less than 16 feet in length, inside measurement, and full width of car, not to exceed 5 cents per mile traveled; or if under 16 feet but not less than 12 feet in length, inside measurement, and full width of car, not to exceed 4 cents per mile traveled.

(e) All of the post-office cars mentioned in the preceding sections shall be of such style and character, furnished in such manner, run with such frequency and speed, and on such schedules, as shall be required by the Postmaster-General, and shall be constructed, fitted up with the necessary furniture and fixtures for the proper handling and distribution of mail, maintained, heated, and lighted by gas or electricity, by and at the expense of the railroad companies; and clerks in charge of the mail shall be carried without additional charge therefor.

(f) When post-office car service shall be authorized on any route by the Postmaster-General, as provided herein, no additional compensation shall be allowed on account of the weight of mail carried on said route; and it shall be the duty of the railroad company operating said route to carry additional mail in closed pouches in charge of its employees on other than the post-office cars, when so directed by the proper officers of the Post-Office Department, without further compensation.

(g) For routes upon which no post-office cars are authorized by the Postmaster-General, but on which mails are carried in closed pouches in charge of employees of the railroad company, the pay per mile of route per annum on routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 800 pounds or less shall not be to exceed $75; over 800 pounds, the rates to be as provided by existing law for transportation of mails on railroad routes; the average weight to be ascertained as provided by law; the service to be performed with such frequency and speed and by such a schedule as will be satisfactory to the Postmaster-General.

(h) The compensation herein provided shall apply only to electric and cable car routes not exceeding 20 miles in length; the compensation for carrying the mails on electric and cable car routes longer than 20 miles to be as provided by existing law for the transportation of mails on (steam) railroad routes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment——

Mr. PICKLER. A point of order is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota make a point of order?

Mr. PICKLER. I have been trying to do that all the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point on all of pages 6 and 7 and all of page 8 down to the word "routes," in line 8.

Mr. CANNON. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. PICKLER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The rate of payment contained in the provisions to which the gentleman makes his point of order is, I think, too large. It is, however, a maximum rate. Even this rate, however, would in my judgment give better service and reduce the compensation now paid to these railways. Saying nothing about the point of order, I believe that the provision ought to stay in the bill and that the maximum rate of compensation should be reduced from 12 cents to 10 cents. The truth is, that the rate named in the bill is higher than that paid to steam railroad companies, though in fact these street-car lines can afford to do the service for less.

I am not speaking of the gentleman's point of order; I do not know whether it is well taken or not; but I suggest that the provisions—with the amendment I have suggested—would give better service and cheaper service than if no such provisions were adopted. Having said this much, I have said all that I desire to say about the matter.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know as to the merits of these provisions. But the chairman of the committee [Mr. LOUD] has informed us that all these matters are safe with the Postmaster-General—that the matters in regard to fourth-class postmasters, rural delivery, etc., are entirely safe with that officer. The chairman assures us that the Postmaster-General will properly take care of those matters. Now, I think that if he can take care of those he can take care of this. I insist on my point of order that the provisions embraced in the portion of the bill I have cited are new legislation—wholly new.

Mr. LOUD. What part of the bill does the gentleman leave in?

Mr. PICKLER. I leave in the proviso—

That all street-railway companies carrying mails under the foregoing provisions shall furnish free transportation to letter carriers to and from the post-office and their respective routes, when such distance shall exceed one-half of a mile, as the Postmaster-General may direct.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why does the gentleman except that from his point of order?

Mr. PICKLER. Because that can go with the other provision retained in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LOUD. No, sir; I have nothing to offer. I am free to admit that this part of the bill may possibly be subject to a point of order. I had supposed we might rely on the good sense of every member of the House to recognize the necessity of these provisions in view of the extension of this class of service.

Mr. QUIGG. I call the attention of the Chair and of the gentleman from South Dakota to the economy in the public service which is contemplated by the provisions against which the point of order has been made. I also call attention to the fact that the proviso against which the gentleman has not made his point of order relates directly to the provisions to which his point applies. If the gentleman presses his point of order, it defeats the economy which the proviso seeks to accomplish.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from New York can make a point of order against that proviso if he wishes to do so. I have thought it a good thing to have these railroad companies transport the letter carriers free. I have thought that a measure of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. This claim of economy is merely technical.

Mr. LACEY. I ask the Chair with what law do these provisions interfere?

The CHAIRMAN. They create new law.

Mr. LACEY. These paragraphs only make appropriation for carrying out the purpose of the old law.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of this committee [Mr. LOUD] has gone further than members generally would be willing to go in conceding that these provisions are subject to a point of order. The fact is, these paragraphs simply make a specification in detail of the manner in which an entire appropriation shall be expended. They simply designate the manner in which the Postmaster-General shall parcel out this money. It seems to me that where there is a detail of this kind, which is very important to the proper disbursement of the appropriation, and where the chairman of the committee simply says that he is in doubt whether the provisions are in order, that it ought not to be accepted as a concession that the point of order is good, but the Chairman of the committee in his ruling should cast the doubt in favor of the proper administration of the appropriation.

Now, sir, the carrying of the mails is a matter of vital importance, and should be done with regularity. This appropriation is a large one, and I submit that it ought to be expended under the rules prescribed here. Where you are making a limitation simply on an appropriation already made I hold that it is not subject to the point of order where the principle of the appropriation is already embodied in the bill.

Mr. LACEY. Unless the Chairman has made a final ruling——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. In the first place, the point of order can not be made halfway down in a paragraph of the bill. I hold that it must be made on the whole of the paragraph or none of it. You can not by a point of order make a bill senseless——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman from Iowa was present or not when the first paragraph a, of this part of the bill was read and the gentleman from South Dakota made the point of order upon it. The Chair suggested then, by permitting this paragraph, or this portion of the bill, to be read, the gentleman from South Dakota would not lose his right to make the point of order upon them all. The Chair suggested to the gentleman that the point of order should be made at the end of the paragraphs.

Mr. LACEY. I understand that, Mr. Chairman, but the gentleman proposes to divide this paragraph, making a point of order upon a part of it.

Mr. LOUD. He proposes to segregate paragraph h from the rest of it.

Mr. LACEY. That is the point that I suggest to the Chair can not be done. It leaves the bill a mere jargon by leaving the balance of the provision in an incomplete and uncertain condition. If the gentleman from South Dakota desires to make the point of order against a particular part of the bill, he must take the whole of the paragraph, and not segregate a portion from the rest. You can readily see where such a principle would lead. He can not single out a portion of a paragraph that would make the bill senseless or ungrammatical.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman think that a proviso to a paragraph might not be stricken out?

Mr. LACEY. But aside from that, here is a method pointed out for the distribution of the funds already appropriated by the bill. There is no law forbidding the use of money for the transportation of mails on electric cars. Suppose an electric line be put on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from here to the city of Baltimore, and next year, when the appropriation bill comes up, a provision is inserted to carry the mail over the electric line between Baltimore and Washington. Could it be held, as the gentleman from South Dakota proposes in this case to hold, that this is new legislation? It is simply a change in the motive power of the route. We make an appropriation to carry the mails on street cars drawn by horses, for instance. Next year the motive power of the car is changed, and they use either a cable line or electric cars. Could it be claimed that it was new legislation to make an appropriation for continuing the service on that line simply because the motive power was changed?

It is perfectly clear that without inaugurating new legislation the House has a right to appropriate the money necessary to carry the mails between any two points or to distribute the mail at either one of the points; and because there is a change in the motive power and the method of the distribution of the mail, and the change is recognized, it is not a change, and can not be held to be a change, in existing law. In this case there is no change of law and no modification of the law. It is not even the enactment of a new law. It is simply a matter of detail in regard to the carrying of the mails already authorized by law.

With all due respect to the Chair, therefore, I suggest that the Chair should reconsider the ruling; because if we can not make a provision of this character we can not provide for carrying the mail in a manner that would not be objectionable from one end to the other.

Mr. CANNON. If the Chair will permit me, I wish to make a suggestion that may possibly accomplish the object the gentleman from California has in view and what the committee would be glad to do, probably, or would make the point of order untenable or unavailing.

My suggestion is in effect—and I will move an amendment, if necessary, commencing on the top of page 6, in line 1, to insert before the words "the Postmaster-General" as follows: "In making the expenditure of the money appropriated in this paragraph, the Postmaster-General is authorized," and so on. I would also propose to strike out the words "and directed," in line 1, on this page. Then along in the bill——

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. PICKLER. Is the gentleman offering an amendment now?

The CHAIRMAN. He is not, but simply calling attention to one that he proposes to offer if the opportunity arises.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will offer it when I get a chance. I am giving notice.

Further along in the bill I propose to reduce 25 per cent the maximum compensation allowed.

It seems to me that that would make the limitation for which the money provided in this paragraph should be expended. It is given under the law, but in expending the money certain limitations are placed upon it.

The Chair is quite familiar with the power to place limitations on the expenditures of the money appropriated within the law. It is the same power exercised when you refuse to appropriate in pursuance of law, or when you appropriate a less amount than the law provides. In other words, in giving the money you place the limitations within the law on the expenditure.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say about what amendment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may offer hereafter. I only want this point of order ruled upon.

In answer to the very vigorous and demonstrative argument of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], that leaving this proviso in here would make this matter senseless, let us see how far the gentleman has examined it. He evidently did not examine it at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is pertinent to the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I want to address myself to the point of order. The Chair has ruled that item 27 is legitimate, and we have left that in the bill. That reads:

Twenty-seventh. For transportation of mail by electric and cable cars on routes not exceeding 20 miles in length, $150,000.

Now, turn over to the proviso which the gentleman says is senseless, and you will see that it reads connectedly. It says:

And provided further, That all street railway companies carrying mails under the foregoing provisions shall furnish free transportation to letter carriers to and from the post-office and their respective routes, when such distance shall exceed one-half of a mile, as the Postmaster-General may direct.

If that does not make sense, I should like to know what would make sense. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] can not connect two propositions in any more legitimate and reasonable way than these two connect. I insist upon my point of order.

The Chair certainly has no doubt of this point of order being good. The chairman of the committee confesses it. Everybody confesses it except the gentleman from Iowa. There are provisions for the length of cars in this paragraph b, which reads as follows:

(b) For full railway post-office cars, to be used for postal purposes only, to be operated independently of other cars, and to be not less than 16 feet in length, inside measurement, not to exceed 12 cents per mile traveled.

Then in the other paragraphs there are other provisions. These matters are all new propositions and changes of existing law.

Mr. LACEY. What existing law fixes the length of postal cars?

Mr. PICKLER. If there is no law then this is new law.

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to say a word, Mr. Chairman, in advocacy of the gentleman's point of order. It seems to me it is just simply a question of common sense. Does existing law provide bicycles and electric cars and all that kind of thing for carrying the mails?

Mr. PICKLER. No.

Mr. TALBERT. If it does not, it seems that it is a question of common sense to determine that the adoption of this paragraph does change existing law. I am reminded of what I saw the other day in one of my papers——

Mr. TAWNEY. I should like to ask the gentleman what existing law this changes.

Mr. TALBERT. Why, there is a change all round, and, as I say, I am reminded of what I saw in a paper the other day. A gentleman in the Northwest wrote to a friend in this city to know if he could dispose of a carload of fine horses in the city of Washington. His friend replied to him very promptly that he could not; that the men and women in Washington rode bicycles; that the street cars are run by electricity and motors, and that the Government is run by donkeys; and in consequence there is no demand for horses. [Laughter.]

Now, it does seem to me that this committee desires to change the whole system of delivering the mails in this country. I think, sir, under these circumstances, that this point of order ought to be sustained, and let this appropriation to buy bicycles and street-car tickets be applied to some better purpose.

Mr. LACEY. Suppose that heretofore the custom has been to carry the mail or run the Government by a donkey. What existing law is there that requires that custom be perpetuated?

The point that I seek to make, and that I failed to make clear to my friend from South Dakota, is that this is simply a recognition of improved machinery, of different methods. For instance, a pneumatic tube is put in between two cities. Why can not the mail be carried through that tube? Why can they not make a contract for carrying the mail in this way? This is merely a limitation on the expenditure of money, without a change of any existing law and without creating any new law.

Mr. PICKLER. There is no law for it, and the gentleman seeks to get a law for it. That is the point.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to say a word, unless the Chair is ready to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this plainly creates new law where none exists, and it is therefore obnoxious to the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if that took out the proviso?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order, if the gentleman will give his attention, was raised against that part commencing with the proviso on the bottom of page 5, down to the end of "Provided further," in line 8, page 8.

Mr. LOUD. Can the gentleman divide the simple proviso in that way? That is under the head of letter H. Can the point of order be raised against one portion of the paragraph and not the other? Must not the whole go?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is on that portion on which the gentleman raises it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, before the point of order was made I offered an amendment at the end of line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. My amendment was offered before the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. At what portion of the paragraph?

Mr. TAWNEY. At the end of line 13, after the word "direct," on page 8.

Mr. CANNON. Well, my amendment is before that.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is striken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. LOUD. If it is not too late, I would raise the point of order against that "Provided further." Let it go out altogether. If any of it is to go out, let it all go out together.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to know what the chairman of the committee makes his point of order against?

The CHAIRMAN. Against the remaining part of the paragraph.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to have it reported, so that I may know what it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That all street-railway companies carrying mails under the foregoing provisions shall furnish free transportation to letter carriers to and from the post-office and their respective routes, when such distance shall exceed one-half of a mile, as the Postmaster-General may direct.

Mr. PICKLER. I understand the chairman of the committee makes the point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. As I understand it, pages 6 and 7, and down to line 13 on page 8, are now stricken out of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CANNON. I now offer my amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Can I not, therefore, offer as an amendment to paragraph 27, at the bottom of page 5, at the end of line 25, the amendment which I offered at the end of that paragraph which is stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the gentleman can when he gets the floor for that purpose. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I move to insert after the word "that," on line 25, page 5, the words which I will ask the Clerk to read. I will just state it to the committee before the Clerk reports it, and that will possibly do away with the necessity of reading. I propose to move to put back these words stricken out literally, with the following additions. In line 25, after the word "that," on page 5, insert:

In making the expenditure of the money in this paragraph mentioned (a) the Postmaster-General is authorized to adjust the compensation to be paid for the transportation of mails on electric-car and cable-car routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned, not exceeding the rates now authorized by law.

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point of order that it is too late for that. We have passed that section.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; we have not.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, Mr. Chairman; the whole of paragraph 27, on the bottom of page 5, is a separate and distinct proposition, and it was kept in the bill on that ground. Now, we have gone on over two pages, and I make the point that the gentleman can not go back now to amend that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to make the point of order that the amendment comes too late?

Mr. PICKLER. And that it is new legislation, too.

The CHAIRMAN. That is another consideration.

Mr. PICKLER. I make both points of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 25, after the word "that," insert:
"In making the expenditure of the money in this provision mentioned (a) the Postmaster-General is authorized to adjust the compensation to be paid for the transportation of mails on electric-car and cable-car routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned, not exceeding the rates now authorized by law."

Mr. CANNON. I will state what I offer puts it under the proper head with all the words that have been stricken out put in with an addition. In other words, I take the words that have been stricken out and add to and amend them so as to make it a different proposition and move it as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order that this is new legislation?

Mr. CANNON. I only desire to say one thing. It seems to me that in appropriating $150,000 under the law—and it is admittedly under the law—for transportation upon street-railway lines, it is perfectly competent to place a limitation upon the expenditure of the money thereby appropriated for the coming year. That I seek to do, and I do this upon the ground, or rather upon the principle, as I stated a while ago, that you can withhold appropriations entirely, you can withhold them in part, or you can place limitations upon the expenditure, so as to leave a part of the law inoperative. That is what I have sought to do by this amendment.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, appropriation is made in various appropriation bills for carrying the mails over certain lines of railway, without any limitation as to the character of the cars or without any limitation, for instance, as to gas. There is a provision put into the law designed to preserve the lives of the men who are attending to the mails on those cars, but that does not change existing law. It simply provides that the railway companies that accept the money under this appropriation shall not heat the mail cars with coal oil or with stoves, but shall heat them by electricity. That, I say, is not a change of existing law? There is no existing law upon the subject. Neither can it be said to be new legislation. It simply imposes a condition upon this appropriation, subject to which this appropriation shall be accepted. It provides a method of carrying out this legislation, a means by which the Government can avail itself from time to time of the best class of service. It might occur that on a given route there are two lines, either of which could carry the same mail, but one of which would do the work under certain conditions and with certain provisions for the protection of the mail carriers and the expedition of the mails. We certainly can put into the law a provision that the line which accepts the contract under this appropriation shall comply with certain conditions and requirements. Such a provision does not change existing law in any respect, nor can it be said to make new law, because it does not go any further than the disposition of the particular fund hereby appropriated.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is not that a law for one year?

Mr. LACEY. Simply with reference to this particular appropriation.

Mr. DINGLEY. But that is legislation for one year.

Mr. LACEY. But there is no existing law on the subject.

Mr. DINGLEY. That does not make any difference. You are making law on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twenty-seven and one-half. For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Boston, Mass., by way of New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans, $196,614.22: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have read the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, before that amendment is offered, I desire to raise the point of order against this paragraph. First I will state that I regret very much that I feel called upon to raise the point of order upon this provision of the bill, because it, perhaps, puts some of my very close friends in a peculiar position. But, sir, if this proviso be in order, then you can put upon this bill any number of subsidies extending through this whole country. There are in the bill, as you understand, two following this. The point of order that I make is that this is new legislation, not warranted by existing law. The act of 1876 and previous acts, which you will find in the postal laws, prescribed the limit of money that could be paid for the transportation of the mails by rail, and here now Congress is seeking to pay an increased amount of money for the transmission of mails.

Now, I admit that this item has been in appropriation bills heretofore, but I hold that the fact that an item has been in an appropriation bill for one or more years does not give it the status of a law, and I call the attention of the Chair to a ruling which he made himself some few days ago upon the item relating to the salary of the private secretary of the President of the United States. In that case the appropriation bills for a number of years had carried $5,000 as the salary for that secretary, but the Chair held, very properly and justly as I think, that while the appropriation bills for a number of years might have carried a given amount of money for a given purpose, that fact did not change the existing law, and I hold that although this pending item may have been in the appropriation bills for a number of years, that fact does not give it any existence as a statute—an existing law.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California makes a point of order against the provision for special facilities on trunk lines from Boston to New Orleans via Atlanta. For many years, eighteen years, I believe, there has been carried in the general appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department a provision for a sum to facilitate this fast-mail service. Frequently the point of order has been made against it, though perhaps never before by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill. That, I believe, is a novelty which we now have for the first time. Ordinarily the gentleman who reports a bill is supposed to be in favor of it, and if there are provisions in a bill coming from his committee which he does not favor he usually turns it over to some gentleman who does favor those provisions, so that the bill may be reported and managed by a member who favors it, and not by one who opposes it.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman does not desire to do me an injustice. This is no new phase of the case. His colleague from Georgia assumed the same position. So far as management is concerned, I do not assume to represent the committee upon this proposition, and I will yield to any gentleman who desires to present the opposite view.

Mr. CRISP. But the gentleman puts himself in the attitude of being the director, mover, and controller of a bill in the House to which he is himself opposed, and he makes points of order against his own bill. That is a novelty, and I call attention to it only as a novelty.

This provision, however, is not new or novel. It has been in the Post-Office appropriation bills for many years. In 1893 a point of order made against this identical language was determined adversely by the Chair, an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair and the decision sustained; so that the law of the House was settled on this question. I take it for granted a decision when so made is binding upon the Chairman and the House.

The language carried in these bills for many years was simply "For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines," marking out no particular trunk lines to which the appropriation should apply. In 1893 this identical provision was incorporated in the Post-Office appropriation bill. It will be found in the RECORD of February 18, 1893, page 1807:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Springfield, Mass., via New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans.

A point of order was raised against the provision—against that part of it designating particular trunk lines over which these facilities should be afforded. It was argued that such designation was new legislation and therefore obnoxious to the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. I know the gentleman wants to be correct historically. The remarks he has made would leave the impression that this appropriation had mentioned no particular places until 1893. Permit me to say that the appropriation as carried in these bills for a number of years designated the Atlantic Coast Line and named Tampa, Fla., as the terminus. In 1893 a point of order was made that the provision included at this time in the bill was a change of law because the application of the sum was changed bodily from one railroad line to another. On that point the gentleman's remarks might convey a wrong impression.

Mr. CRISP. Was that line named in the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; the Atlantic Coast Line was named, and so was the terminal point, Tampa, Fla.

Mr. SWANSON. The appropriation simply named certain points; it did not provide that the appropriation should be expended upon any special railroad.

Mr. LOUD. It was in the same form as this appropriation.

Mr. CRISP. In 1893 this point of order was elaborately argued. The decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole at that time will be found on page 1813 of the volume of the RECORD to which I have referred. I will not read the decision, because it covers a column and a half of the RECORD, and I presume it is not necessary to occupy time in reading the whole of it. The final statement of the Chair is:

The Chair feels constrained to overrule the point of order, holding that the paragraph is not obnoxious to the rule, in that it is for a public object already in progress, and the words indicating the cities between which the special mail facilities are to be had are a mere limitation upon the discretion of the Postmaster-General in the distribution and expenditure of the fund.

Mr. DICKERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask to appeal from that decision.

Mr. KYLE. I offer the amendment now, Mr. Chairman, to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky, the Chair understands, desires to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DICKERSON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 98, noes 23.

So the decision of the Chair holding that this identical provision was in order on this identical appropriation bill was sustained by a vote of the Committee of the Whole. If any question is settled, if any matter is to be regarded as res adjudicata, it seems to me that it is this question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to page 474 of the report of the Postmaster-General, where the Second Assistant Postmaster-General details this service from the New York starting point to New Orleans, making an exhibit of the expenditure for the last fiscal year of $171,000. Since 1889 the proviso in connection with the fast-mail service has been in these words:

That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interests of the postal service.

This has been the proviso attached to this appropriation since 1889; and the Post-Office Department, believing that it was for the promotion of the interest of the postal service, have made the expenditure.

The first appropriation in connection with what is called the fast-mail service was made in 1877 in this language:

For inland mail transportation, namely, $150,000. The same may be used by the Postmaster-General to obtain proper facilities from the great trunk lines of railroad for the railway post-office service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878.

This proviso in this very or similar form has been in every Post-Office appropriation bill from that date up to the bill now before us. The Post-Office appropriation bills passed in 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, and 1888 have simply this provision:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines.

In 1889, as I have already stated, the provision was inserted giving the Postmaster-General discretion for the promotion of the postal service.

Mr. Chairman, the rulings have been, I think, uniform in almost every Congress. The point of order has been raised again and again against this provision. I believe that at one session the provision was not reported in the bill by the Post-Office Committee, but an amendment was offered in the Committee of the Whole upon which a point of order was taken on which the Chairman declined to rule, because he desired the decision of the House, and by the express act of the House the amendment was inserted as proposed, although not reported by the committee.

The language of the rule is "unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." That is the language of Rule XXI, clause 3, under which the point of order is made. Mr. Chairman, the word "object," which has been referred to so much in discussing this point of order, is defined by Webster as "that on which we are employed." Certainly we are employed on this work. This service is by a train wholly and absolutely under the control of the Post-Office Department. It does not come under the general statute with regard to inland mail transportation, to which reference has been made and in which are specified amounts to be allowed for weight and space. It is a special train which the Department controls as to its hour of departure, as to its speed, as to the points at which it shall stop, and as to the time at which it shall reach the end of its route. It is a train wholly under the control of the Department.

Mr. BROMWELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this subsidy given to this Coast Line or this Southern Railroad line is the only pay that the line receives from the Government for carrying that mail?

Mr. BINGHAM. They get weight.

Mr. BROMWELL. They get weight just as the other lines do?

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course.

Mr. BROMWELL. So this $196,000 is a subsidy in addition to what they would get by weight for the service?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; and the route is of that importance to the service, I will state to the gentleman, that it is the only way that train can be controlled and made subject to the orders of the Department.

Now, an examination of this provision or rule will show that it was adopted as early as in 1838, and until the Forty-fourth Congress was always and universally construed as authorizing the appropriation for a purpose previously appropriated for, provided it was of a character that might properly be continued, and there are numerous rulings to this effect prior to the Forty-fourth Congress. There are also rulings subsequent to that Congress. For instance, we have the ruling of Mr. Wellborn, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, on February 19, 1885, at the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress. We have also the ruling of Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky in the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress, the ruling of Mr. Cox of New York in the Fiftieth Congress, and of Mr. BLANCHARD, which is quoted by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], on February 18, 1893, all of which sustain the holding of this paragraph in all of the Post-Office appropriations bills.

Volume 65 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-eighth Congress, first session (1884), shows that the same point was raised and under consideration, and I will give the gentleman some good authority in connection with the discussion which then took place. I quote from the argument presented on this floor at that time:

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say simply a word, to call the attention of the committee to clause 3 of Rule XXI. It provides:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress."

Now, there was an appropriation made last year and for several years prior for these special mail facilities, and the point of order has been raised before. The ruling of the Chair has been uniformly, according to my recollection, that an amendment such as this now proposed is in order, because it is only a continuation of the objects for which the prior appropriation was made, and of which the Chair will take official notice.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that the point of order can not be sustained against such an amendment, and that it can be put upon broader grounds, because it is a part of the very work or business of appropriating money to carry on the mails in which we are now engaged. In making such appropriations we have the right to appropriate the money for any purpose deemed necessary to carry the mails, unless of course such appropriation shall be in contravention of some existing law. Nothing of that sort can be said by any possibility in opposition to the proposition made here.

It was my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to quote also the ruling of Mr. BLANCHARD in the last Congress; but the gentleman from Georgia has already given that. Mr. Springer made a similar ruling in the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, in which he overruled the point of order, but finally submitted the matter to the judgment of the House.

Since 1877 a paragraph of this character has been carried in every Post-Office appropriation bill, and the rulings are largely in the majority for its remaining in the bill. It is a continuing work, and has been so held. The train was equipped and the road has been arranged for the accommodation of this service. The train has been run under the control of the Department, and it is the only way the Department can have the service and control it.

I think the conclusion has been reached by every Chairman, when this question has been under consideration, that the paragraph is properly in the bill, that it has been there for all of these years, and that, as reported to-day by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House, it should remain.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire only a word or two in reply to the point of order made on this proposition by my colleague, the gentleman from California, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I am aware, as is the House, of the constant opposition of the gentleman from California to this proposition. It has been carried, however, by the Post-Office appropriation bills for a number of years past, and against it points of order have been repeatedly made, and every time, I believe, overruled.

When the provision was being considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads there was a proposition submitted, which immediately follows this one, and also one immediately following that, of a similar character—that is to say, an appropriation for the other roads named in the bill to supply mail facilities for other sections of the country. It was the opinion of the committee, after discussing the matter, that they should be put into the bill as separate items, for the very reason that if a lump sum were put in, covering all of these roads, the entire paragraph would be obnoxious to the point of order; and in order that this provision, which has been in the bill for so many years, should not be ruled out or become obnoxious to the point or order, if raised, the committee voted that it should be inserted as a separate item, and that the other provisions which might, perhaps, be subject to the point of order should stand as independent items in the bill.

I wish to say to the committee and my colleague that there are certain provisions of the bill that did not meet with my hearty approval; but inasmuch as it was the act of the committee, I have indorsed and supported the bill as a whole, and I understood from a question propounded to the chairman a day or two since by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] and the response thereto that the chairman himself, while he had consistently opposed this provision, was not going to make a point of order against it now or to oppose it; but having reported the bill and being in charge of it that he would not make this point of order.

Mr. LOUD. Let me say that the gentleman never said anything of the kind.

Mr. SETTLE. I read from the RECORD, page 2561:

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent that general debate be closed in one hour, and that the time be equally divided.
Mr. QUIGG. An hour on both sides?
Mr. LOUD. Half an hour on each side, if there are two sides. I was not aware that there were.
Mr. QUIGG. I think if the gentleman will state frankly whether he intends to attack any portion of this bill——

At that point the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] interrupted and said:

I have exhausted my time upon this bill, and I am now simply seeking to accommodate other gentlemen who desire to debate it.

I may have misunderstood the impression intended to be conveyed by the gentleman, but the impression left on my mind by the manner in which he responded to the interrogatory of the gentleman from New York was that the gentleman, notwithstanding his personal opposition to certain features of this bill which had been put into it, not by his act, but by the act of the committee, that he, being in charge of the bill, was going to stand by it. If it is understood that, this bill being the joint product of the committee, we are not bound by it as a committee upon this floor, I should like the chairman of the committee to announce that policy, because there are certain other provisions in the bill on which I should like to submit amendments.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman submit to a question right there?

Mr. SETTLE. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. I will ask the gentleman if he did not stand up here the other day and vote in favor of an amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]?

Mr. SETTLE. Yes; because, as stated by the chairman of the committee himself, the effect of that was not to change conditions actually in existence, but was rather to direct the discretion which was already conferred upon the Postmaster-General, so that it was a mere matter of form and not a matter of substance.

Mr. LOUD. I do not question the motive of the gentleman, but he reserved the right to oppose certain portions of this bill, as I understand it. I opposed this portion in the committee, and the gentleman did not oppose in the committee the provision that was voted upon the other day.

Mr. SETTLE. I understand the gentleman has consistently opposed this provision throughout his term in Congress.

Mr. LOUD. But you did not oppose the other provision in the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SETTLE. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the gentleman to say that in the opinion of the committee these three items stand upon a different footing in so far as points of order are concerned?

Mr. SETTLE. That was the opinion entertained by a number of gentleman, and expressed.

Mr. DOCKERY. In the committee?

Mr. SETTLE. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to know the judgment of the gentleman on that question.

Mr. SETTLE. I do not know that that would shed any light upon the subject, and certainly it would not guide the gentleman in his action.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the New Orleans proposition is in order, the second or Kansas City proposition, which is fully as meritorious, if not more so, should be retained in the bill.

Mr. SETTLE. The gentleman must draw a distinction between an appropriation carried in a regular appropriation bill for a series of years and a new proposition to extend to other routes and other territory.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this provision in this bill authorizes the Postmaster-General, for special mail facilities, to pay this amount. As said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]—and I want to invite the attention of my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], to this fact—the schedules of these trains on the roads receiving these moneys are fixed by the Post-Office Department. One of these trains leaves New York City at 4 o'clock in the morning, receiving at that time mail from Boston and other sections. Leaving at that hour, it can not receive much passenger traffic. It is not allowed to stop where the railroad officials would like to stop it for the purpose of passenger traffic, but its stops are regulated by the Post-Office Department. Its schedule is fixed by the Post-Office Department, and the entire control of it is under the government of that Department.

Now, this road can not run a train for the purpose of increasing the mail facilities from Boston to Washington via New York, then from here via Lynchburg, Danville, Charlotte, and through the entire South, connecting with New Orleans, close connections, and supplying Mexico with its mail, connecting with steamers for Cuba at Tampa. All of this schedule is with a view of putting mail into that mail schedule, and the schedule, as I said, is arranged by the Post-Office Department. I respectfully submit to the Chair that the precedent stated where this point has been frequently made and each time overruled is one that should govern in the present case. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I shall not stop now to discuss the merits or demerits of these various provisions in this bill for special facilities. Upon this point of order such a discussion is not germane. I submit to this House that these various items which follow in this bill, against which the gentleman who has just taken his seat stated some objections, are equally meritorious with those proposed in the item now under consideration.

Mr. SETTLE. The gentleman will permit me to say, in order to put myself straight, that I am not opposing these propositions, but shall vote for them.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. But, Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this proposition he states something as the action of this committee, of which he is a member, which I deny, and that is that the committee said by any vote or otherwise that the two following provisions are subject to a point of order and this is not. It is not fair to submit what takes place in the committee room, but I say a discussion arose there as to what questions would be raised, and it was thought better by all that they be submitted as separate propositions; but that the committee said that the following items would be subject to points of order or anything of that kind—no such ruling was made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at some time in the history of these appropriation bills this item under consideration was a new item, and at that time the point of order was made against it, and what was the ruling of the Chair? Simply that it was in pursuance of "an object already in progress," that of carrying the mails throughout the United States. That item has been in every single Post-Office appropriation bill for sixteen years. It is true that in 1893 a ruling was made by the Chair that has been quoted here. It was a new item. Previous to that time they had not fixed the termini of the road. Previous to that time the lines were not designated over which it was then designed for it to go. So that at that time the ruling which the gentleman from Georgia says is conclusive upon this committee was conclusive as to each one of the items in this bill, on the ground that it was carrying out "an object already in progress," to wit, carrying the mails throughout the United States.

Now, sir, there is in this bill an item of $27,000,000. Will any gentleman here presume to state that if this committee had seen fit to separate these items into detailed statements of the roads over which the mails should be carried, that it would be subject to the point of order? Not at all. I say that under the general provisions of law the Postmaster-General may designate these very routes over which it is proposed to carry these mails here now under existing law and appropriations that are made, if the appropriations for inland mails are sufficient. But they say, as did the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], that that would be against the existing law in regard to the weighing of the mails. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the proviso that is added to each one of these items, and that is that it shall be made in accordance with the discretion of the Postmaster-General. He may require, in the expenditure of this money, that it shall be done at the pound rates or at the ton rates as provided by law now, so that in making these expenditures he may pay simply so much of this money as is required to carry the mails, and he may make it on the exact items of cost now provided by the law in regard to the transportation of mails throughout the various lines in this country. So I say, Mr. Chairman, that this item is not subject to the point of order, because any provision of law carrying with it this appropriation is in order when it is for the transmission of the mails throughout this country.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania read here a statement made by the present Speaker of this House upon this very appropriation. He laid down the rule that it was not subject to the point of order because it was carrying out a general provision for carrying the inland mails of the country; and I say, further, that it can not be claimed here that it is subject to the point of order because it changes any existing law, for the reason, as I have said, that it is within the power of the Postmaster-General, to carry out the provision of the law, to make this cost exactly in accordance with the law now provided for carrying the inland mails; and it has been ruled in this House, and I think by this very Chairman, that the point of order made here, that there is an existing law, cuts no figure, because all of these items enumerated in the bill expire with the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. So I say that every one of these items stands upon precisely the same footing and neither one of them can be subject to the point of order.

I say, gentlemen, further, that these items following the one that is now under consideration ought each to be allowed by this House; and I say that the same reasons apply to the item from Kansas City to Newton that apply to the southern line to New Orleans. Over that line of mail to Texas and California it will make a saving of twelve hours' time, and I submit to this House that in those Southern and Western districts these special mail facilities are necessary for the accommodation of the people. Gentlemen must remember that in that part of the country we do not have mail trains six and eight times a day, as you do through the East, and when you can make a saving of twelve hours in the transportation of your Southern, Southwestern, and Western mails, it is an object that you ought to be eager to attain so as to give the people of the West and South the advantage of such additional mail facilities.

There is another item in the bill that I wish to bring to the attention of this committee, though I do not know that I ought to do so upon this point of order. A mail train leaves Kansas City upon the Santa Fe route at night, and there is another at 10 o'clock in the morning. Now, the train contemplated here is to leave at 3 o'clock in the morning. The mail in Kansas City is gathered at 6 o'clock in the evening, and all matter deposited after that is left over until 10 o'clock the next day. That 10 o'clock train is carrying the general mail, but the train leaving at 3 o'clock, which this item provides for, will overtake it at Newton. As a result of that, the general mail now being paid for by the Department in the general service will go on this train running to Texas and California, and the figuring out of the proposition is that this item of $81,000 really will not cost the Government to exceed $15,000 or $20,000, while there will be a saving of twelve hours on all the mail for Texas and California over the Santa Fe system.

So, Mr. Chairman, I say that upon these different propositions the merit is with the subsequent items as well as with the first, and they are no more subject to the point of order than the first is, and they ought to be retained in the bill because they constitute good legislation in the interest of the people who need these special mail facilities.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important point of order that has been raised, not because of the few paragraphs to which it may be applicable here, but because of what may result in the future if it shall be held that there may be reported by the Postals Committee, or moved as an amendment on a postal appropriation bill, a proposition giving to any particular railroad of this country an extra compensation for carrying the mails. All the railroads of this country carrying the mails, except the special line mentioned in the first paragraph, are now paid at one uniform rate, dependent upon the weight of mail that they carry. That is the law without exception.

Our rules provide that no appropriation shall be reported in a general appropriation bill, or moved as an amendment thereto, unless authorized by law, unless in continuation of a work or object previously so authorized. The paragraph against which the point of order has been raised has, since 1878, varied that rule of compensation established by law in the case of one particular line of railroad. That paragraph went into the bill originally without the point of order being raised against it, on the plea that it was important to have this fast mail running from Boston to Tampa, Fla., and that such extra compensation ought to be given, in order that we might secure close mail communication with Habana, Cuba. The provision was put into the bill originally for the purpose of expediting our foreign mail service to Habana. It has been in the bill every year since that time. Points of order have been raised against it since it was first put on an appropriation bill on at least two occasions, and the paragraph has been sustained as being in order, on the ground that it was for the continuation of an object already in progress, to wit, the running of this particular train expeditiously, and therefore, as held, an object already authorized by law—the law, however, being only the appropriating clause for each year. It has never been held to be in order except upon that ground.

This paragraph, therefore, stands on a very different basis from that on which the paragraphs following it in the bill stand. The object authorized by law has always been held to be the expediting of this line of mail, not the mere general indefinite object of furthering mail facilities throughout the country. Now there have been ingrafted upon the pending bill, as might have been expected, two additional paragraphs of like nature, without, of course, even the pretense of being an object heretofore authorized by the so-called law of an appropriation. Of course, if this sort of business is to be initiated, and is to go on, every railroad in this country is likely to reach out for this additional subsidy or additional compensation not authorized by law.

I remember that in Postmaster-General Wanamaker's administration he stated in his report that the appropriation made by this paragraph did not expedite or improve even this particular service, and that it caused a great deal of trouble in arranging with other railroads. He said, in substance: "You have given extra compensation to one line of road; now give it to all or to none." He said that this special compensation to this one line acted as an obstruction to the Department in dealing with the railroads throughout the country.

As I have said, at least twice this particular paragraph has been held in order because it was in continuation of an object previously authorized by law—and two years ago the House in committee sustained the decision—and if it is to be held in order now it must be so held on that and no other ground. Now, this point does not apply at all to the two paragraphs that follow, because it is not claimed that they are in continuation of an object authorized by any existing law, not even by a provision in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I will ask the gentleman whether at the time when the ruling was made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], which was read by the gentleman from Georgia, this was not a new item? Was it not an item fixing the termini at different places from those named in preceding bills?

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, certainly. There was a variation of the Southern terminus, but he held that the paragraph was in continuation of an object authorized by existing law, the facilitation of the service on this particular line. I thought the ruling made at that time was improper; I still think so, notwithstanding the Committee of the Whole sustained it.

In this connection I may say an "object previously authorized by law" had always previously to that ruling, so far as my observation extended, been construed to cover objects authorized by permanent law—not objects authorized for a single fiscal year by an appropriation in an appropriation bill. The mere placing of a particular appropriation in an appropriation bill for any particular fiscal year, beginning with the year and ending with it, does not make permanent law, and the object referred to in such a provision is not a continuous object. But I admit the contrary was held with respect to this item, and because this improper decision was sustained by the Committee of the Whole on that occasion, the present Chairman may feel himself constrained to follow that bad ruling on the first paragraph.

Mr. LINNEY. Allow me to ask this question: In all matters of doubt, is it not always the safer course to follow precedent?

Mr. DINGLEY. Personally, I do not think there is any doubt in the mind of any gentleman who has judicially examined the ruling referred to. Let me say to my friend from North Carolina that if it should possibly be ruled that new items of this character may be placed on this appropriation bill from year to year, giving to any particular railroad company a subsidy or additional compensation not authorized by law, there is not a railroad company in the country that would not come in and ask for such a subsidy. And gentlemen representing any district where there is such a railroad would be obliged to present an amendment for this purpose. And when such amendments are held to be in order, nobody can tell what would happen, especially if all the railroad companies interested in the matter should combine.

Gentlemen must see what such a ruling would open up, with all the railroads of the country claiming a subsidy or additional compensation for carrying the mails. There is no trouble now in securing the best possible mail service from all railroads for the compensation provided by law. That transportation is being satisfactorily provided throughout the country, and all the railroad companies are satisfied with the compensation fixed by law. If we begin giving additional compensation to one line other lines will want it.

Hence I say, that while I think the ruling made twice in this House on this first paragraph has been wrong, yet if that ruling is to be sustained in this case on the ground that it has been held that here is an object previously authorized by law, because it has been provided for in an appropriation bill for several years, still that principle must not be held to apply to the new items that appear in this bill, for no one pretends that they are objects heretofore authorized by law.

Mr. BROMWELL. The gentleman from Maine has said, as I understand, that the original object of this appropriation was to expedite foreign mails.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir; the mail to Habana, by way of Tampa.

Mr. BROMWELL. And the terminus of this subsidized route has now been changed?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROMWELL. Does the gentleman from Maine see any difference between the right of the roads constituting the route as now changed, and furnishing only inland transportation—the appropriation being practically for expediting fast mails between New York and New Orleans—does the gentleman see any difference between the right of that line to demand a subsidy and the right of the Baltimore and Ohio Company to demand a subsidy for carrying the mails from Washington to St. Louis, or the right of the Cincinnati Southern Railroad to demand a subsidy for carrying the mails from Cincinnati to New Orleans?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. As I have already said, I believe the whole thing is wrong. But it must be borne in mind that this change has not been made in this bill; it was made in previous bills. I think that even this provision ought to be held out of order; yet I can see some force in the claim that has been made for ruling it in order from the fact that it has been in previous appropriation bills. I can see how it may be contended, as my friend from Philadelphia has contended, that this is "an object previously authorized by law." I think such a construction does not come within the intention of the rule. I think the intention of the rule is that the object should be authorized by permanent law—not simply by a temporary appropriation operating for a single fiscal year.

But the point to which I am now calling attention particularly is that even if that view be taken it should not be held to apply to any new authorization.

Mr. QUIGG. It is quite true, is it not, that these lines which formerly connected at Tampa still make mail connection with Habana?

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, I assume that they do through other lines.

Mr. QUIGG. So far as the connection with Habana is concerned there is simply another terminus.

Mr. DINGLEY. My own belief is that the mere fact that this provision has been carried in the appropriation bill from year to year, even for seventeen years, is not an authorization of the object by permanent law within the contemplation of the rule. Certainly there is not even this slight peg on which to hang a decision that the subsequent paragraphs making appropriations for additional compensation to new lines never before mentioned in appropriation bills are not new legislation.

Mr. GROUT. Why, of course, it would last only for the current appropriation.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is my idea. But I have in mind the fact that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole in the last Congress held that because this appropriation had been in the bills for some years previously it came within that class of appropriations previously authorized by law and was, in other words, a continuing object. I disagreed with him at the time in that position, and I have seen no reason to change my judgment since. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I understand the gentleman to say that an appropriation for the current year, while it would be legal to expend it, does not constitute law or authorize, in the language of the rule, an appropriation for the coming year?

Mr. DINGLEY. That is my view. I think that with the exception of the decision on this particular paragraph referred to that has been the uniform trend of decisions.

Mr. GROUT. It is not law beyond the life of the appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. I only wanted to get the matter clearly before the committee.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, the present rules of the House were adopted with reference to the previous decisions of the House and of its presiding officers in the past, and when it is conceded that for seventeen years this provision has been held to be admissible under the rules of the House on an appropriation bill, when the rules were substantially as they are now, that seems to me to be a confession that this provision is not amenable to the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. It has certainly been a continuing object.

Mr. LACEY. In the last Congress this question came up before the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Mr. O'Neil, of Massachusetts, then presiding, on an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill, and there was a discussion covering this same point. A proposition was inserted in the bill for the disposition of some of the Indian lands. Modifications were made in the existing law as to their disposition, and a point of order was made upon the provision. It was said that there was a general law covering the matter and that the House could not change the general law upon the appropriation bill. The Chairman of the committee, however, said in ruling against the point of order:

The Chair finds, upon looking at the matter, that it is the universal custom in considering these treaties to modify and change them just as is now being done in the present bill, and that it is not only true of Indian treaties, as the Chair understands, but it is also true of other treaties.

In other words, that if this had been an original proposition he might have held differently, but he found that similar propositions had been held in order for consideration in the House on previous occasions, and that such being the case, and the rules of the House being the outgrowth of the construction placed by the House itself and by its presiding officers on questions of this character, he would hold the proposition to be in order. And it was held to be in order, because as the law is made with reference to the decisions of the courts, so the rules of the House are made with reference to the previous construction given to them by the House itself.

Now, here is a proposition that the gentleman from Maine is discussing with reference to its propriety, as to why it is a good thing to give to the Atlantic Coast Line, which supplies the South and Southwest with speedy mail communications, the appropriation provided in the bill. But that is not the question with which the Chair has to deal. The question is whether we are infringing upon existing law; and in view of the precedents heretofore established it seems to me it is the duty of the Chair to overrule the point of order and to follow the precedents which have become the rules and practice of the House.

When the question as to the wisdom of the appropriation comes up it will be within the power of the House to strike out that portion of the bill, if it sees proper, and a motion to strike out will be entirely within the rule for consideration.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make simply a statement with reference to the point of order raised.

As has been well stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], we must consider that our rules were adopted with reference to the precedents that the House itself has established in regard to them. It will be improper for the Chair to overrule the previous decisions interpreting the meaning of a specific rule, because it is presumed that the House concurred in that interpretation by reason of the fact that the rule has not been changed in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the question of order.

The point of order is raised upon this provision of clause 2 of Rule XXI, which contains two propositions:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

On the last proposition in that clause of the rule the Chair would be in no doubt whatever but that the point of order was well taken, because the Chair finds that the general law upon the subject is that the pay per annum per mile shall not exceed the following rates, which are specified, and this appropriation is in excess of the amount provided by the general law. Now, this appropriation has been in the appropriation bills for the last seventeen years, an excess over the amount limited by the general law, for substantially this route; and it is claimed——

Mr. LOUD. Not substantially the same route until two years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, for this exact route for two years, and substantially this route for a large portion of the time; but the general proposition has been in the bill for seventeen years.

Now, it has been claimed heretofore—perhaps not so strenuously to-day—that placing that item in the appropriation bill for the year changed the existing law not only for the time the appropriation took effect, but for all time thereafter. The present occupant of the chair has expressed himself upon that question before, that such appropriation only changes the law for the year for which the appropriation is made; that it does change the law as to that year, but for no subsequent year; and if this was the only clause in the rule the Chair would feel constrained, notwithstanding the decisions of previous Congresses—so plain is the law and the rule in that regard—to sustain the point of order upon this second proposition.

But there is another provision in the rule, to which the Chair will call attention:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

The Chair has examined the decisions made upon this question in former Congresses. There are three or four distinct rulings, and generally the ruling of the Chair has been based upon the first proposition in this second clause of Rule XXI, that this was in continuation of objects already appropriated for. That may be a strained construction of that clause of the rule. If it was an original proposition, and there never had been any decision by any previous House, the present occupant of the chair would be inclined to view the second clause of that rule as applying to all cases:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The Chair would be inclined to hold that that second clause covered every case; but after consideration by different members of the House who have occupied the chair, and the reasons that have been given after full debate, and also in view of the fact that the committee has on one occasion at least, by a large majority, sustained the Chair in that ruling, the Chair is inclined to follow the precedent thus set, and to hold that this paragraph is in order under the first proposition of the second clause of Rule XXI, as being in continuation of an object already appropriated for and authorized by law, although that authorization is limited to the present fiscal year. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order upon that ground.

Mr. LOUD. I move to strike out the paragraph; and in support of that I desire to be very brief, because I have gone over this ground very thoroughly heretofore.

Before going into the matter, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to one point or one difficulty that possibly may confront him hereafter in his ruling.

Mr. BROMWELL. If the gentleman will allow me, I have an amendment at the desk which should be considered before the gentleman's motion is considered, and I ask the gentleman to withhold his motion until my amendment can be offered and voted upon.

Mr. LOUD. Very well, Mr. Chairman; I will yield for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to offer his amendment.

The amendment of Mr. BROMWELL was read, as follows:

Strike out in lines 17 and 18 the words "one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and fourteen dollars and twenty-two cents"; and insert after the word "Orleans," in line 17, page 8, the following words:

"And from Cincinnati, Ohio, by way of Chattanooga, Tenn., and Birmingham, Ala., to New Orleans, La.; and from Washington, D. C., by way of Cincinnati, Ohio, to St. Louis, Mo.; and from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans.; and from Chicago, Ill., to Council Bluffs, Iowa; and from Chicago, Ill., to Minneapolis, Minn., seven hundred thousand dollars."

Also, strike out the words commencing with the beginning of line 23, page 8, and ending with the last word in line 11, page 9.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. The last part of that is inapplicable.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order on that under the ruling and decision just made by the Chair. I hope the gentleman will not seek to embarrass this matter.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, this matter of the point of order upon this proposition has been so thoroughly discussed that I do not care to make any argument upon it. I merely wish to say this, that I can conceive of no reason in the world why this one line should be given a subsidy of $196,000 while other lines are now carrying fast mails without any appropriation from the Government and many of them are carrying mails for which they are not paid at all.

Mr. MEREDITH. I think the gentleman is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. BROMWELL. Well, I think I have the right to talk as I please upon the point of order—for a few moments anyway. [Laughter.] Why should we give this subsidy exclusively to this one line, to the exclusion of every other line in this country equally meritorious? Now, I propose by this amendment to tap this line to which this subsidy is given, the Coast Line, at Washington City, and see that a fast mail goes West as far as Cincinnati and St. Louis for distribution, and also to tap it again at Cincinnati, so that a fast mail may go through the Southern States to the Gulf. Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall speak to the point of order.

Mr. MEREDITH. I do not want to be discourteous to my friend.

Mr. BROMWELL. I have endeavored with all the intelligence at my command to try to master the meaning of these two provisions which have been quoted from our rules in the points of order that have been raised. I can not understand, and I do not desire to reflect upon the Chair, how the ruling of the Chair on the point of order which has just been raised and decided was made. It seems to me that they are two independent rules, and if an amendment which is proposed to a bill comes within the meaning and the provisions of either one of these rules, that it is subject to the point of order. I can not understand how the Chair can say that if that second rule alone had been in existence and the first had not been there he would have decided the point of order well taken, and afterwards say, in spite of this second rule, which prohibits any new legislation on an appropriation bill, in spite of that, because his predecessors sitting in the chair as Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole have so decided that under the first section of that rule the point of order is not well taken against this particular subsidy.

These are two entirely distinct and separate rules; and if this amendment is subject to the point of order under either one of them it ought to go out now. Then, if the Chair can sustain this, that is, the provision which is now in the bill reported by the committee, and say that the point of order can not be raised against it because it was in last year's appropriation bill, it seems to me that there can be no reason given why this amendment I propose may not go into this bill. As I say, I have been listening to all that has been said, and I have been trying as intelligently as I could to apprehend what is meant by this rule in question; and I can not but feel that the statement of the rule as given by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is a correct one; that the mere fact that this subsidy for the Southern Line was in the last year's appropriation bill is no reason in the world why it should go in again. If it be true that no new legislation is now proposed in this subsidy, then I can not understand what objection there should be to our proposition to give subsidies to other lines equally meritorious.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call your attention to one thing here which may be a little embarrassing in relation to the ruling the Chair made on the preceding paragraph. The only ground that the Chairman had to stand upon there was "in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." Although the work in progress may be a public building or the improvement of river and harbor works, of course the Chair does not mean to assume that we can go on in an appropriation bill beyond the amount of money that has been provided by statute. As as illustration, if we appropriate for the construction of a public building and limit the cost to $250,000, the Chair can not assume, "for the continuation of a work already in progress," that we can in an appropriation bill—in the sundry civil appropriation bill—go beyond the limitation fixed. Now, then, I have stated the first proposition of the Chairman. Of course you can not reverse yourself, but you see you may get tangled up in these propositions before you get through.

The law provides that railroad companies shall receive such an amount of money for mail pay. Within that, of course, Congress has the power to appropriate, but beyond that it is exactly a parallel case with a public building. You have no power, except by special legislation, to go beyond the proviso contained in the statute enacted. I think, Mr. Chairman, that if the preceding provisions were in order this amendment must be. I can not see how it can stand upon any different plane, because it is subtantially the same character of work. The Chair himself gives no force to the argument that it has a standing before this House because it was in a previous appropriation bill, but only recognizes it as in continuation of work already in progress. Now, that consideration must necessarily apply to this as well as to the other paragraph; it is in furtherance of the work of expediting the mail.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, Who is responsible for the paragraphs which have been discussed during the last four or five minutes? On whose recommendations were these several subsidies inserted in the bill? Have they been recommended by the Post-Office Department?

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman frankly that the Postmasters-General for years have condemned this system in unmeasured language. Even the present Postmaster-General, though perhaps he may have voted for this at some time, condemns it in unmeasured language. This is not a certified item. It is not submitted by the Department to the committee. As to who is responsible for it, permit me to say to the gentleman that if I knew I could not divulge it.

Mr. COUSINS. I think there are one or two of these items that have no precedent in former appropriation bills. For instance, I read a paragraph which appropriates $100,000 to improve the facilities for carrying the mail from Chicago to Council Bluffs, and prescribing that the mail shall be carried via a certain route. Now, I do not understand that any such provision as that has been passed in previous appropriation bills. Somebody must be responsible for the recommendation of a paragraph of that kind. Do I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to say that he does not know who is responsible?

Mr. LOUD. I said that if I did know I should not tell. [Laughter.]

Mr. COUSINS. Oh! [Laughter.]

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will give him the information he desires.

Mr. COUSINS. That is what I am after.

Mr. LORIMER. Just before this bill was ordered to be reported to the House, we had up for discussion in the committee this item for fast-mail service from New York by way of certain Southern cities. At that meeting there was inserted an item of $81,000 for expediting the mails from Kansas City to Newton. At the same time I discovered that a committee of citizens of Chicago had been before the Committee on the Post-Office requesting that an item of $100,000 be inserted in this appropriation bill for special mail facilities from Chicago to Council Bluffs by way of the Burlington road. and on my motion this paragraph was placed in the bill. Since the bill was reported I have learned that we have three other roads running from Chicago to Council Bluffs that can just as well handle the mails as the one that would necessarily be compelled to carry them if this item remains in the bill in its present shape, and for that reason I have prepared an amendment to strike out "by way of Burlington," which will leave the matter open to competition between the four roads running from Chicago to Council Bluffs.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, that is entirely satisfactory. I simply wanted to know who fathered this provision, and to know why it was limited to one route. I do not wish to be understood as being against any kind of increased facilities for carrying the mails from Chicago to Council Bluffs. I am in favor of increased facilities, and I would like to have as many such facilities as possible. For instance, it might be a good thing to have the lines that run most direct from Chicago to Council Bluffs recognized in this provision for increased facilities.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, is there not a point of order pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There was a point of order pending, but the Chair sustained it, and after that some discussion was had.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then is there any other amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understood the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. He did, but afterwards withdrew the motion.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think that motion was withdrawn only temporarily. Does not the chairman of the committee intend to renew his motion to strike out this paragraph?

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir; I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 8, lines from 14 to 22, inclusive.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from California will allow me to ask him a question, I should like to call his attention to the statement he made a moment ago that the present Postmaster-General and preceding Postmasters-General have condemned this appropriation for special mail facilities. In connection with that statement I wish to call his attention to a proviso contained in the bill:

Provided, That no portion of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Referring him to the fact that every Postmaster-General has actually expended this appropriation, I want to ask the gentleman from California if he proposes to substitute his judgment as to what the Postmaster-General thinks for this demonstration of what the Postmaster-General thinks?

Mr. LOUD. I am perfectly willing to yield for questions, but I do not like to have a gentleman take up all my time in propounding a question so that I can not answer it within my five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is recognized now in his own right.

Mr. LOUD. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that the Postmaster-General accepts the direction of Congress and continues the service. That is all. The fact still remains that every Postmaster-General since 1890 has persistently and consistently, over his own signature, condemned this system, and urged Congress not to appropriate for the purpose.

Mr. QUIGG. Is there anything in the report of the present Postmaster-General condemning it?

Mr. LOUD. There is nothing in the present report; but there is a communication which the gentleman from Missouri has here upon this very subject. The Postmaster-General did not touch this subject in his last report.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I proceed to discuss as briefly as possible the pending provision of the bill. The proposition which directly concerns us is to give a subsidy to a line of railroad running a train between New York and New Orleans, leaving New York at 4.30 a. m. and arriving at New Orleans at 8.30 p. m. the next day. Now, of course our Southern friends and gentlemen living along this line of railroad will tell you with great candor that this arrangement expedites the mails, that this is a fast train, and that it is absolutely necessary for them in order that they may receive their mail matter in time. Sir, this train leaves New York, as I have said, at 4.30 a. m. The regular mail train leaves New York at 12.15 at night, and this night train accommodates not only the New York mails, but also the mail leaving Boston at 5 o'clock the same afternoon.

This train leaving New York at 4.30 a. m. is not a fast train. It is a train which lumbers along down to Washington, arriving here at 11.15. This rapid train, this fast-mail train that gentlemen speak of, occupies six hours and forty-five minutes between New York and Washington. This train, if the facts were known, is a milk train when it leaves New York, and after lumbering along until it reaches the vicinity of Philadelphia it then becomes a passenger train, accommodating travel from that city to Washington. I affirm that the real wants of the mail service are accommodated by the mail train leaving New York at 12.15 at night.

Now, let us follow this fast-mail train to its terminus. Our friends claim that it gives the city of New Orleans an expedited mail. The New Orleans Board of Trade has come here urging the continuation of this train, saying: "Don't take off this train; if you do it will ruin our industries." Sir, this train arrives at New Orleans, when it is on time, at 8.30 p. m. The mail which it carries can not reach the post-office earlier than 9 o'clock. Where is the business man who is waiting to receive that night the letters which arrive at the post-office at 9 o'clock? There is no delivery that night, of course. Now, sir, the regular mail train arrives in New Orleans at 7.40 a. m. As a matter of course the two mails, so far as that city is concerned, could both go upon this train which arrives in the morning. Gentleman, I do not believe there are twenty men in this House who, if they would calmly investigate this question without outside surrounding inflences, would vote for this appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. May I ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. LOUD. Well, if I am confined to five minutes I would rather not undertake to answer questions.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply want to ask the gentleman a single question in the line of his argument. Is it not a fact that for more than ten years the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad has furnished these special facilities for carrying the mails between Chicago and Minneapolis without any subsidy whatever?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy and many other railroads of the country have done the same. The New York Central, running an exclusively fast-mail train between New York and Chicago, a train upon which not a single passenger is carried, receives from the Government not one cent in addition to the regular mail pay. The New York Central was formerly a participant in this subsidy; but that company at last said to the Post-Office Department, "Under the regular system we shall be well paid. We do not desire to participate further in this fund; we believe it is a disturbing condition; we refuse hereafter to be participants in the fund."

Our New England friends, of course, have in many instances advocated this subsidy, assuming that they shared in its benefits. But, sir, this appropriation has not been expended beyond the city of New York for a number of years.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question with reference to the New York Central?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California be allowed five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, before the gentleman resumes, I wish to ask him this question: Did not the New York Central give up its allowance under the special-facilities provision because the Post-Office Department gave it a reweighing of the mails, outside of the four years' limitation provided by law, and by this reweighing does not the New York Central receive annually several hundred thousands of dollars?

Mr. LOUD. I can not say as to that.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is so.

Mr. LOUD. That is a question which might be answered one way or the other without affecting the merits of this proposition.

But permit me to say—and we may as well recognize the fact here as anywhere else—that the Pennsylvania Railroad is the strong factor behind all this proposition. You withdraw that support and the proposition falls to the ground instantly of its own weight. And let me say that that road receives but the insignificant sum of about $27,000 out of this appropriation.

Mr. MILES. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Is it your opinion that this train will run anyway, even without the allowance?

Mr. LOUD. Why, Mr. Chairman, this is the long route to New Orleans. They have to run a fast train to compete with the shorter lines. That is a plain business proposition.

Now, the railroad from New York, without taking into consideration the little lines connecting with it, for regular mail pay receives over $1,000,000 a year. This is done by reason of the concentration of the mails on that road. This same is true of such roads as the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road, the Cincinnati Southern road, and other lines where they have put on fast-mail trains, and the postmaster has concentrated the mails from a number of roads on the one line, which gives a very heavy mail, and they are enabled, by reason of the large pay received for the service, to run these fast trains.

But this fast train to the South, by the time-table of the company itself, is shown to be two hours slower than the regular passenger train over the same road. Now, you can consult the time-table for yourselves; here it is. I do not care to take the time of the committee to read it, but it shows exactly what I have stated, that it is two hours slower than the regular trains run on the same line.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question just there? I know that he does not want to misstate the facts.

As to the failure to spend the money on the other side of New York, of which the gentleman speaks, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General states that the reason why it is not expended there was because he could not make proper schedules with these roads.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, they did not want to participate in the fund?

Mr. SWANSON. No; but because he could not make proper schedules of time with the roads.

Mr. LOUD. Very well; I will even concede that and accept the statement of the gentleman if he will allow me to proceed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this question of railroad transportation or mail pay for this service is a very important item; and I say now, and I wish I could get every railroad manager in the United States to come here and coolly and calmly discuss the proposition—I say that this matter of the transportation of the mails over the railroads is one of the most aggravating questions now confronting the American people. We are paying enormous rates, permit me to say, for the transportation of mails on railroad routes. There has been no reduction in this pay since 1876.

Mr. BINGHAM. Eighteen hundred and seventy-eight.

Mr. LOUD. Well, since 1878. Now, I will put the question to any gentleman here: Is there any business venture in this country, of any kind or character of business, or in the labor of the country, that has not been reduced during that period?

I have heretofore on the floor of the House, and I suppose you know the fact, been consistently opposed to the reduction, the horizontal reduction, suggested in the mail pay. I have opposed the reduction, not that I believed the companies are not getting too much, but because I desired, as far as possible, to maintain existing conditions. I insisted that if the horizontal cut were made in the pay of the railroads it would disorganize the service throughout the country, and I can not understand what motive there is behind this proposition for continually bringing it before Congress to agitate and aggravate the people of the whole country. The Pennsylvania Railroad people, as I have already said, are the people back of this whole proposition.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, what makes you make that proposition?

Mr. LOUD. Because it is a fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman readily understands that facts are facts. Now, the gentleman from California has stated that this great corporation, for its mail facilities furnished to the Government, received about a million of dollars under the general statutes——

Mr. LOUD. A million of dollars? Why, they get nearly three and a half million dollars from this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CROWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "and," in line 16, on page 8, and add the words "and Houston, Tex.," after the words "New Orleans," in line 17, on page 8.

Mr. CRISP. I thought there was a motion pending to strike out to be first determined.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. I make the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine raises the point of order against the amendment. The point of order is made under clause 2 of Rule XXI. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CRISP. Just a word or two, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the criticisms of my friend from California [Mr. LOUD]. This committee might very well wonder, after listening to the gentleman's argument, how this provision to expedite the mails found a place in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will permit me, I will tell him.

Mr. CRISP. One moment. The gentleman states in the first place that the train which carries this mail is slower than another train on the same road.

Mr. LOUD. That is correct.

Mr. CRISP. And yet the law provides, and has provided for years, that no part of the appropriation made for this purpose shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

The gentleman's argument would lead you to believe that the Postmasters-General, both Republican and Democratic, had expended this money not to further the interests of the postal service, but to further the interests of some railroad company. Do you believe that is true? Do you believe the gentleman makes a frank statement when he says that? Are you prepared to say that Postmasters-General for the past ten years or seventeen years have paid out this money unnecessarily, when the law left it absolutely in their discretion to pay it out or not? Are you prepared to say that they have paid it out not to foster and promote the postal service, but to foster and promote the Pennsylvania Railroad?

Mr. LOUD. This proviso has only been in the bill two years.

Mr. CRISP. Then for two years. The gentleman stated that the Postmasters-General had always opposed it; and yet how is it, Mr. Chairman, that with the full discretion on the part of the Postmasters-General either to pay it out or not to pay it out, as in their judgment it would further or not further the postal service, every Postmaster-General, Republican and Democratic, has felt it his duty to pay it out? Why, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that is an absolute refutation of the suggestion made by my friend from California [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. LOUD. Of course you do not deny the time-table?

Mr. CRISP. If my friend from California can establish the fact which he has stated before this committee; if he will go to the Office of the Postmaster-General and show that it is not necessary to expend this money to facilitate the transportation of this mail to the South, I will venture the assertion that not one dollar of this money will be expended, even if we do authorize it in the bill. This is no absolute appropriation, but it puts it in the discretion of the Postmaster-General—to be expended only if, in his judgment, the expenditure will promote the interests of the postal service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the people in the section where I live feel some interest in this matter. It is not a question of the Pennsylvania Railroad or any other railroad. Here is a great mail line from New York to New Orleans, which has a branch to Florida, serves Cuba, and goes out to Texas. For many years this has been expedited. This is only one of many cases where extra pay is given for rapid work. When you appropriate for and appoint a great number of carriers in a city, to make four or five deliveries daily, you are giving extra pay for rapid work. When you make a contract with electric-car companies, you are giving extra pay for rapid work.

This line gives us our mail at Danville, Charlotte, Atlanta, and Montgomery fourteen hours earlier than we got it before the mail was expedited. To New Orleans and Birmingham it makes the delivery fifteen hours earlier. To Houston, Tex., fourteen hours; and to all the points in the Southwest, fifteen.

Under the contract made by the Postmaster-General he has the absolute control of the schedule. This train leaves the city of New York at 4.30 in the morning. I am sure that if my friend from California happened to be in New York and was coming to Washington, and could come on a train at 4.30 in the morning or one at 9, he would wait until the 9 o'clock train. So it is with all the other passengers. Now, in order to make connections here, the train must leave there at 4.30 in the morning without passengers.

The train here must wait for such train; the train at Charlotte must wait; the train at Atlanta must wait; so that by the arrangement with the Postmaster-General the mail is transferred, and in that rapid way connections are made. In the contract, as I understand it, there is a provision that on their failure to connect and deliver the mail upon schedule time the Postmaster-General has the right to "dock" the road the amount that it would have been paid if the mail had been delivered on schedule time. Now, that is all there is in it. We have had this service for many years. It has been a comfort to all that section of the country; our business men, our newspapers, and our people generally have been greatly benefited by it, and I appeal to the committee now not to deprive us of the advantages derived from it simply upon some vague suggestion made by the gentleman from California. And, as I said to you, if he can substantiate what he says, you know and the chairman knows, and everybody knows, that the Postmaster-General will never pay out a dollar of this money. He is not authorized to pay it unless it promotes the postal service; and if it does not he will not pay out a dollar.

Mr. QUIGG. May I ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York desires to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. KYLE. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman from Georgia said a moment ago that if the mails were not delivered on time the Postmaster-General reserves the right to enforce a penalty.

Mr. CRISP. That is my understanding.

Mr. QUIGG. That is the way I understand it. That is not in the law, but it is a provision of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CRISP. I am not informed as to that.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the general statute.

Mr. QUIGG. Well, is it not a fact that under this provision the Postmaster-General is now in a position to make these trains faster or not to expend the money?

Mr. CRISP. I so understand.

Mr. BINGHAM. Under this law the whole schedule is under the direction of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, this proposition does not come before the House to-day for the first time. At a former session of Congress I made an effort to strike it out on a point of order. I thought then, sir, that sufficient argument was made to establish the fact that the clause similar to this was subject to the point of order. But I do not propose to discuss that to-day. I am opposed to this appropriation because it is a subsidy and wrong in principle. Now, admit, for the sake of argument, that this train carries the mail into the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Louisiana some faster, we can not justify ourselves in voting this appropriation, because this particular community of our common country gets an extra benefit from it, because it is an unjust and improper discrimination. The mail matter of this country is weighed every four years.

The Post-Office Department at stated periods weighs the mail matter for a given length of time, and upon this weighing a contract to carry the mails for the succeeding four years is made. Now, what makes it right to send the mails over this line more expeditiously than over the other lines of the country? The condition, gentlemen, is coming to the front that I predicted years ago with reference to this proposition—that the time is not far distant when every railroad in the United States will be clamoring at the doors of Congress for an extra appropriation for carrying the mails. They are doing so now. In this bill are two new lines. If these get in, others will, until there will be a sufficient number of them to control Congress in this respect. I did not pose then specially as a prophet, but the statements that I made then are being verified to-day. How are you going to say to these gentlemen whose mail goes out from Cincinnati and down through the country in which I live that we will give this road this extra-facility pay and not give it to them? I submit, gentlemen, that you can not sustain this appropriation upon principle.

Now, something has been said about what the Postmasters-General have had to say upon propositions similar to this. I want to to say now, Mr. Chairman, without fear of contradiction from any source, that every Postmaster-General that has made any statement with reference to them has inveighed against them. I challenge contradiction upon that proposition. There is not a Postmaster-General since this system has been in existence who has stated to Congress that it was proper and ought to be continued.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KYLE. I have but little time, but I would like to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WELLINGTON. The question is, if the Postmasters-General have been opposed to this appropriation, why, then, have they from year to year expended the money when they had it within their power under the law to refuse to pay it?

Mr. KYLE. I suppose they have considered the fact that Congress had made the appropriation as an expression favorable to the idea that it should be used in this way, and that the railroads, seeing it was made, insisted upon it as to some extent right that they should have it.

But take our present Postmaster-General. What does he say when he comes to that question? Mind you, it is his duty under the law to submit estimates of the amount necessary to run his Department for two years. I call special attention to that, because he is a gentleman who served here with you in the House and many of you know him as a man of the finest character, and I believe it has been stated that he voted for a proposition like this when he was a member of Congress. He has become familiar with the necessities of the Post-Office Department now, and what has he to say? I read from his last report or the report of his Second Assistant. Hear it:

> In submitting the estimates for the fiscal years 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896 this office declined to include the item of "special facilities," for reasons heretofore stated.

And he, as his predecessors have done, declines to submit an estimate.

He submits to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the estimates of the amount of money necessary to carry on the mail service, but he does not include this. Why? Evidently because he does not think it proper to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. KYLE. Now, gentlemen, if the Postmaster-General, the man whom you intrust with the management of the postal business of this country, does not think that it is necessary, and does not ask you for it, is it a proper thing for members of Congress, upon the casual investigation that they are enabled to give this question, to force it upon him, and that, too, at a time when our Treasury is in a strained condition?

Now, I will call attention to the views entertained by other Postmasters-General. General Dickinson during his administration condemned the principle involved in this proposition as demoralizing to the service. General Wanamaker, in his annual report made in 1892, uses this language:

> The special-facility allowance has for some years past been the source of much annoyance to the Department, and has hampered the best interests of the service.

Now, gentlemen, if you accept these statements of the heads of the Post-Office Department as true, and you can not deny them, are you going to thrust upon the Department an appropriation which not only does not do the thing which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] claims, but which, as Mr. Wanamaker says, actually hampers the best interests of the service?

As I said a while ago, this proposition is wrong in principle, because, to use a common expression, it is making fish of one and fowl of the other. It is wrong in principle. It is in the face of the opposition of all the Postmasters-General that have ever attempted to deal with the subject.

Now, let us look for a moment at the compensation paid to the railroads for mail service. Take the very system of roads that is now receiving this extra subsidy; I mean the line from Boston, Mass., by way of New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans. It is to-day receiving for carrying this mail, outside of this subsidy, $1,522,125.59, yet by this proposition you propose to give them $196,614.22 for doing that for which they are already more than abundantly paid. The amount paid these lines without the subsidy is in excess of that which is required to run the governments of many of the States of this Union.

Now, with this vast sum of money going into the coffers of this railroad system, with the Postmasters-General against the appropriation for the extra subsidy, are you going to appropriate the amount anyway, in violation of principle, of fair dealing, of justice between the respective sections of this country, especially when you have nothing to show that it is necessary for the mail service?

Mr. CRISP. What railroad is it that the gentleman says gets over a million and a half of dollars?

Mr. KYLE. The line from Boston, Mass., by way of New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman spoke of it as if it were one railroad, whereas several great railroads are included in that line.

Mr. KYLE. Well, I regret that I have been misunderstood upon the proposition.

Mr. SWANSON. Let me say to the gentleman that, in the preceding discussion of this subject to which the gentleman has referred, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HENDERSON, made a statement in which he compared the pay of this road with the average pay of 14 railroads in this country for carrying the mails, which showed that this line got only about half the average pay per mile.

Mr. KYLE. I am stating the facts as I have them, and I challenge successful contradiction of what I have said on these propositions. The roads mentioned get pay for the amount of mail matter carried by them, for the work they do, and they ought to be satisfied.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi—and I want to impress this upon the minds of our Western friends—that this particular railroad system is receiving 20 per cent more regular mail pay than any of the roads running out of our cities in the West.

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. KYLE was extended for five minutes.

Mr. KYLE. I shall not abuse the courtesy of the committee by consuming so much time as five minutes. I was about to observe that I should be glad to support this proposition, because I would like to go with my friends here. I can not do it, however, because in my opinion this appropriation, in the first place, does not accomplish the purpose its friends have in view. I have tried to investigate this matter carefully and to deal with it fairly, and I do not believe this appropriation expedites the mail into the South. I think it is simply a lump sum of money given to this railroad system out of the generosity of Congress. If I could even believe that it did expedite the service I might possibly justify my conscience in voting for the appropriation, but I can not get even that consolation out of it. I do not propose to go now into the question of these time-tables. We have gone over that subject heretofore and others have discussed it this evening. It has been stated that this expedites the mail to the city of Houston, Tex., fourteen hours. Gentlemen who make that statement forget that this line extends only to New Orleans, several hundred miles this side of Houston.

Mr. SWANSON. At that point let me correct the gentleman. Heretofore, before this special pay was given to the Southern road, the train arrived at 10.30 at night. It arrives now at 8.30 and makes connection with the Texas and Mexican trains. If the gentleman will look at the time-tables, he will see that, and he ought to know that the Department requires them to make time so as to make that connection.

Mr. KYLE. I want to say this further, Mr. Chairman. These great railroad lines have to run in competition with each other.

The trains that go out of Washington and by Atlanta have to run in competition with the trains that go by way of Bristol and Chatanooga to Memphis. This line being the shortest route from here to Memphis, the Southern Railroad has to run in competition with it, and it is because it has to do that that this mail service is expedited. They know that if they do not run their trains upon such time as will make it desirable for people coming from the West to come by Atlanta those people will take the other line from Memphis and come over the East Tennessee route.

I say, gentlemen, when you take the various questions that enter into this matter, when you consider the violation of principle involved, when you bear in mind that these railroads have to run in competition with each other, I do not believe this Congress can justify itself in voting this appropriation, especially when it is known by every man here that for some years past no Postmaster-General has ever said that such an appropriation was necessary to expedite the mails.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word or two in favor of the proposition embraced in this bill and against striking out the pending paragraph. I do not entirely agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] when he says that this proposition was originally ingrafted upon the appropriation bill because it was intended to expedite the mails to foreign countries. I believe that with that intention there was combined another, and one of greater import to the people of this country. I believe that in this proposition every citizen North and South is concerned; and why? We who live upon the border land know that there are two sections in this country, the North and the South. Living in the State of Maryland, as I do, in a State which is wedged in between the two sections, looking northward to Maine's rock-bound coast and turning southward to behold the vast body of land extending to the Mexican Gulf, I know that there is a sentiment and a feeling antagonistic in some things between these two sections. That was made manifest in the "late unpleasantness" and many a time since.

Now, one thing that has been accomplished by the proposition embraced in this bill is the drawing together in closer ties of union of the North and the South. How do you do that? You bring them together in trade and in commerce, but not only that, you bring them together by the interchange of ideas and mingling of sentiments—by the letters and the newspapers that are transmitted from one portion of the country to the other. The American citizen wants to transact business with dispatch and read the newspaper quickly; therefore you must have quick trains. This has been accomplished by the action of Congress in the provision embraced in this bill.

A train starts from Boston at 7.30 p. m. Having gathered all the mail of New England, it speeds on its way to New York, which it reaches at 4.30 in the morning. Half-past 4 o'clock in the morning is a time when a railroad company can not afford to send out a train for passenger service. We know that railroad companies do business in order to get revenue. Why do they send out a rapid mail train? Because the Government of the United States has given them a special appropriation to make such a train possible.

Leaving New York at 4.30 a. m., this train speeds on its way to Baltimore. There it gathers in the mail of western Virginia and the State of Maryland, and parts of Pennsylvania. It has already taken in its course the mail of the Central States of the Union. Then it goes on its way to Washington and the South, traversing Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, and all that line of Southern States until it reaches the headlands of Florida and the banks of the Rio Grande. Taking in all these sections of country, it makes it possible to bind together these different parts of the country—to unify them. As sections grow more densely populated, sectional feeling tends to increase. The only way to obliterate it is to draw the different sections of the country together by methods of intercommunication—by annihilating, so far as we can, time and space by utilizing all the powers and forces of steam in its lightning swiftness, as developed in fast-mail trains.

Is it true that this appropriation has operated as I have said? Examine the schedule; examine the time that was taken for this service three years ago, when Boston was the northern terminus of this route and Tampa the southern, and compare it with the present. You will find that from fifteen to twenty-four hours have been gained at different points. I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is not right to take a step backward. We are attempting to go forward in all these postal matters. Let us not, then, go backward upon a proposition calculated to bind together the sections of this country, which is one of the most important objects that confront us. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will not weary the patience of this committee more than two or three minutes. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] has dwelt a great deal on the principle which he claims is involved in giving $196,000 for this fast-mail service. Why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that principle pervades every contract made by the Post-Office Department, from the smallest star-route service up to this very proposition now before the House. Sir, what is it that makes the essence of these postal contracts? It is the time; it is the expedition of the service; it is such questions as whether a particular mail shall start at 4 o'clock in the morning or at 8 o'clock—whether it shall be delivered in four hours or eight hours or twelve hours. Time is the essence of these mail-transportation contracts; and it is on this principle that this provision has been inserted in this bill. Take the service on any little star route; you require the contractor to perform certain service under certain conditions. If you allow him to loiter on the way, and possibly not to deliver the mail until the next day, he can take the contract at a much lower rate than if more rapid service is required.

I hope this Committee of the Whole will take no retrograde action. Previous Congresses, whether Democratic or Republican, have been liberal in this matter. We allow extra compensation in connection with our star-route service; we allow extra compensation in connection with our foreign-mail service. The eloquent voices of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] have not been raised against subsidies for foreign-mail transportation. We pay at the rate of $3,200 a ton for letters sent to foreign countries when carried by American vessels, and not over one-third of that amount when carried by foreign vessels. Here is a proposition which requires certain railroad companies to afford special mail facilities on lines running through one-half of this Union. These lines carry mails whose destination is Cuba and Mexico and Central America. The proposition of the bill is to facilitate this service, which certain gentlemen here wish to strike down. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from California will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to strike out this paragraph of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 100, noes 96.

Mr. CRISP, Mr. ADAMS, and others demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chairman appointed Mr. CRISP and Mr. LOUD as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 114.

So the motion to strike out was rejected.

[The announcement of the vote was received with applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to come in at the end of this provision.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, at the end of line 22, insert:

"All railway companies carrying the mails may furnish free transportation on the line of their respective roads to railway mail clerks."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., $81,700: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this paragraph of the bill. It is an appropriation not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FLYNN. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must decline to hear further discussion on the point of order. The Chair has already ruled upon a similar proposition.

Mr. FLYNN. But when a member desires to submit argument——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is aware of the fact that debate on a point of order is always in the discretion of the Chair. The Chair does not feel justified in detaining the committee further to hear discussion upon a question which has been already decided.

Mr. FLYNN. Then permit me to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FLYNN. How can the Chair pass on the point of order on a proposition that was not before the Chair? The proposition that the Chair passed upon and to which the Chair has referred was an entirely different proposition from that presented here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Oklahoma that the point of order was made upon an amendment including this very paragraph and the following one.

Mr. FLYNN. But is it not a matter of argument when there is a distinction or difference in the propositions, and when attention is called to the fact that the exact language is different from that upon which the ruling was made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman, of course, if he desires to be heard upon the question of order.

Mr. FLYNN. I appreciate the kindness of the Chair in consenting to hear a discussion after notifying me that he had already passed upon the question of order.

But I avail myself of the opportunity to say that I fail to see how it is that a proposition which the Chair sustains as not being subject to the point of order, a proposition in the identical language of this with the exception of the substitution of the names of other towns, is in order if this one is not.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the Chair permit a parliamentary inquiry, if the gentleman from Oklahoma has concluded?

Mr. FLYNN. I have concluded.

Mr. DOCKERY. The confusion has been great, but I understand the proposition just read relates to the special-facility item from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., and the point of order is made against it by the gentleman from Maine. I would like to be heard on that point of order when the gentleman from Oklahoma has concluded.

Mr. FLYNN. I am through.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did I understand the Chair to decline to hear further argument on the question of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the question had been thoroughly discussed, and that the Chair had already ruled on a similar proposition.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then I do not desire to be heard upon it if the Chair is disinclined to hear further argument.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Will the Chair permit me a moment?

The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Ohio included various other lines. This proposition is a committee proposition, and is one item by itself.

Now, I submit that, the point of order being made here, we should have a ruling on this point of order and on the particular question raised here by the pending proposition. If the Chair does not care to hear further argument, let us have a ruling upon the proposition that is now before the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled on the proposition. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I ask that a vote be taken upon that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER of Kansas) there were—ayes 120, noes 11.

Accordingly the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Chicago, Ill., to Council Bluffs, Iowa, via Burlington, $100,000: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine makes the point of order against this paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Fortieth. For miscellaneous items, $500.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 25, page 10, insert:
"For continuance of present experimental free delivery in towns and villages, $8,813.55."

Mr. LOUD. I raise the point of order that that is not germane to the subject, not even in the same department that controls the free-delivery service.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oregon desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HERMANN. If the gentleman from California will reserve his point of order——

Mr. LOUD. Very well; I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, for several years the Government has entered upon the policy of supplying certain small towns and villages with a mail service under the free-delivery system. It is known in the law as the experimental free-delivery system. In the last appropriation bill $10,000 was appropriated for that purpose. Forty-six towns were selected by the Postmaster-General for the purposes of this experimental delivery. I venture to say, sir, that in the major portion of those towns the highest success has been achieved. In some towns the records show that the mail service has been very greatly benefited; that, indeed, the revenues have doubled in the course of one or two years by reason of the extension of this experimental free delivery to those particular towns. Now, I desire the ear of the chairman of the committee especially while I read what is stated in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the year 1895, wherein he says:

During the current year investigation will be made to determine if a similar condition does not exist at the other 45 offices—

He having received an adverse report from one of the 46 places—

Those living in the small towns and villages should have the best postal facilities their necessities demand, and if after a full knowledge of the benefits to them of this service (which I believe few) as compared with the cost of extending it throughout the United States the people still want and demand it, I assume Congress will pass the necessary appropriation and the Post-Office Department establish the service in accordance with such law.

Now, sir, the complaint I make, and the point of criticism particularly that I dwell upon, is that in the present bill there is an entire absence of any reference to any further continuance of this experimental free delivery. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have deliberately ignored the former policy of the Government in this respect. No provision whatever is made for the continuance of this service, and, sir, I take the position that in the face of this statement of the Post-Office Department as to a pending investigation with reference to the question as to whether the service should be continued or discontinued, that it comes with poor grace from that committee to entirely eliminate this service from the pending bill. It seems to me that the committee should at least have continued the service until after this investigation could have been had by the Department and properly reported to this Congress. If then the investigation disclosed the necessity for the discontinuance of the service—in other words, if it demonstrated the fact that there was no further use for it, that there was no demand for it, that it was producing no benefit to the people upon whom it was conferred—then I am willing to admit that the time would have arrived for the committee to discontinue the service.

But in the face of this statement of the Department, and I say again in the face of what will appear by the testimony on file in the Post-Office Department, the committee should have continued this appropriation. I am sure that if they had examined this testimony they would very soon have become convinced that this service should not be discontinued at this time, but that at least the sum of $8,813.55 should have been appropriated for the further continuance of the service until after this investigation could have been had.

Mr. LOUD. It is not a submitted item, I will say to the gentleman. The Department does not ask for it, and I do not care to have it interjected into the bill at this time.

Mr. HERMANN. I say to the gentleman from California that I know that the Department does not ask for it, and I am as much astonished at that as I am at the fact that the committee discontinued it because of the further fact that there is ample proof going to show the utility of this service and the further demand of the people who have been benefited by it who wish it to be continued. But if the gentleman from California declines to yield, and insists on the point of order, I admit, Mr. Chairman, that the point is well taken; but I have been in hopes that after having made the statement I have the gentleman would magnanimously withdraw the point of order and allow this item of $8,813 to be appropriated by the bill. I ask the gentleman whether he will do that?

Mr. LOUD. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that this experimental free delivery has been experimented upon until the Department is satisfied that it can not be properly executed without an appropriation of from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000, and I do not think we are prepared at this time to enter upon that service. Hence I can not agree to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me submit this to the gentleman: That it is true that the Department has not recommended it, but at the same time it is going to make an investigation as to whether the service should be continued, and it is now proposed to cut off the appropriation before that can be done. I submit that I do not think that is just.

Mr. LOUD. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to return to two items passed over. They will not take up a minute, and I do not care to go into the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General's department to-night. I ask to return to the two items passed over, and if they are going to take any time I shall ask the committee to rise now. I would like to dispose of those.

The Clerk read as follows:

"For car fare and bicycle allowance, $100,000."

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to insert there $70,000, which I do for the purpose of supplying the amount which was provided for by this electric-car service. Understand that we provided in that part of the bill for the carriage of the letter carriers upon those cars. That system has been destroyed by the House, and I ask to insert $70,000 there.

Mr. PICKLER. I had a point of order pending as to that paragraph. It is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not care to detain the committee, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me that that is exactly in the line of what was stricken out to-day on points of order. This is seeking to give the Postmaster-General different powers from what he has now. This is a change of his power. It is a change of the latitude that he has in the expenditure of money. It confines him in the statute to the expenditure of so much money, while at present he is unrestrained in that way; and it provides in terms for the use of car fare and bicycles, which is not provided elsewhere. I do not think there can be any difference between it and what was held obnoxious to the point of order to-day.

Now, the gentleman from California, the chairman of the committee, as I understood, when we left this said that the action of the House on this would depend on the action on the electric-car-service paragraph. That part has been stricken out, and I understood that, as one would depend upon the other, the point of order in regard to the other would take this out. Now, I interposed the point of order as to this; but I understand the gentleman to state that they were directly connected, and he says now that the electric-car service having gone out, he wants it for that service, and if that is gone out I insist upon the point of order that this is a legislative proposition that is subject to the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. I said that it had no connection with the electric-car service further than it reduced the estimates for this service. We have reduced the amount for this service $70,000 on the supposition that the House would accept the electric-car service. I can not see what ground the gentleman finds to assume that this is subject to the point of order. It is simply providing for the carrying of the mails under the system that has been in vogue here for years. It provides for the carriage of the letter carriers in the expedition of the mails, and I want to state further that it has been carried in that way in the bill for eight or ten years, and it is not a new item.

Mr. PICKLER. Why is it necessary?

Mr. LOUD. If this point of order were to hold as to this clause, Mr. Chairman, I state that it would totally destroy the efficiency of the carrier service of the country to-day.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I withdraw the point of order; but I doubt that it would have the effect the gentleman states.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 24, after the words "one hundred" insert "and seventy"; so as to read:
"For car fare and bicycle allowance, $170,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to offer an amendment to that.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBERT. On yesterday evening when this paragraph was passed over I had read an amendment which I asked to have considered pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment was read for the information of the committee and ordered to be prlnted in the RECORD. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is recognized.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 25, page 2, insert the following:
"Provided, That the street railway companies of the District of Columbia shall carry free all mail carriers when on duty."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is in the power of Congress to enact such a provision as that.

Mr. BINGHAM. What have we to do with that?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think you have the power to make such an enactment. I shall have to make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Before the point of order is made, Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that the street railway companies of the District of Columbia obtain their charters and all their franchises from the Congress of the United States, and there is no question but that Congress has the power to require them to carry these mail carriers free while they are on duty. My amendment is certainly in line with the proposition to improve our facilities for the distribution of the mails. Congress makes an appropriation for this purpose in other cities, but there is no necessity for making an appropriation for the purpose here, because it is in the power of Congress to require these companies to carry the mail carriers free, and it would certainly facilitate very materially the distribution of the mails in the city of Washington.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to accept the amendment if I could, but to my mind it would change existing law, and I make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask to have my amendment read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of lines 24 and 25 and insert in lieu thereof:
"For fourth-class mail service in carrying mail, $100,000."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that amendment. In the first place, I do not think the amendment is intelligible, as "fourth-class mail service" is something unknown to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to amend the language of the amendment, so as to make it applicable to the salaries of fourth-class postmasters. That is my object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment is not germane to this paragraph.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the committee to go to page 4, paragraphs 19 and 20.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nineteenth. For mail-messenger service, $1,130,000.
Twentieth. Regulation screen or other wagon service, $670,000. And the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, use not exceeding the sum of $25,000 of this amount for experimenting in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tube or other similar devices.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a transposition there. Beginning with the word "and," in line 16, I desire to transpose that sentence extending down to "or other similar devices," and to change the amount therein specified from "twenty-five" to "thirty-five" thousand dollars. I wish to insert the sentence after the word "dollars," in line 14.

Mr. BROMWELL. I have an amendment to that effect which is now pending.

Mr. LOUD. I understand; but this will accomplish the object by one motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, insert after the word "dollars," in line 14, the following:
"And the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, use not exceeding the sum of $35,000 of this amount for experimenting in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tube or other similar devices."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the language in this paragraph beginning in line 16, "and the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion," etc., down to the words "similar devices." That is a new proposition, and is clearly subject to the point of order. The Postmaster-General has never had any such power before. It is altogether a new power; it is new legislation; it has no business on this bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the proposition has been in appropriation bills before, but I have some doubt myself as to whether it is not subject to the point of order. However, it is in the interest of bettering the service, it does not increase any appropriation, and I can not see what possible object the gentleman can have in making the point of order against it, because the ultimate effect of it must be not only to expedite, but to reduce the cost of transporting the mails.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if the Postmaster-General has, under the law, general authority to transport the mails?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; and I am free to say that I think he has the power under existing law to try this experiment; but I have not the law at hand, and if the gentleman from South Dakota wants to be persistent——

Mr. PICKLER. This is an entirely new proposition, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to hold that the words "for experimenting" would be subject to the point of order. If the proposition were simply that the Postmaster-General was authorized to use this money for the transportation of the mail through pneumatic tubes it would not, in the opinion of the Chair, be subject to the point of order; but as the language stands in the bill, the Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert in line 14, after the word "dollars," the following:
"And the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, use not exceeding the sum of $35,000 of this amount in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tube or other similar devices."

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this point, lest I forget it, to insert a comma after the word "Regulation," in line 15.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. It is pending.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment while I present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. LOUD. Very well.

HOUSE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following report, which was read and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred sundry resolutions, begs leave to report, and recommends that those which provide for the appointment of session clerks to the Committees on Manufactures, on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and on the Election of President and Vice-President be disapproved.

The resolution providing for the appointment of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Claims during the sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress, who shall receive pay from January 1 last, has been amended by your committee so that the pay shall begin from the date at which said clerk shall take the oath of office, and in that form said resolution is herewith reported with a favorable recommendation.

The resolution providing for the reinstatement of Thomas H. Adams as an attendant in the west cloak room of the House is disapproved.

The resolution providing for the appointment of four messengers at $100 per month and one laborer at $60 per month for service under the Postmaster of the House has been amended by your committee so that it shall read "one messenger at $100 per month and one laborer at $60 per month during the remainder of this and subsequent sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress," and in this form said resolution is herewith returned with a favorable recommendation.

The resolution providing for a stenographer and typewriter for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors at $100 per month during the sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress is disapproved, and in lieu thereof your committee recommend that an allowance of $150 be granted said committee for that work during the remainder of this session, and submit herewith a resolution to that effect.

The resolution authorizing the Clerk of the House to pay to the clerks of committees who were appointed in the month of December, 1895, the amount of salary to which they would be entitled from the date of their qualification to December 31, 1895, had not their predecessors been paid for the full month on December 20, as provided by resolution of the House, is herewith returned with a favorable recommendation—the total amount of same as certified to by the disbursing clerk of the House being $274.99.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That the Postmaster of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ one messenger at $100 per month and one laborer at $60 per month during the remainder of this and subsequent sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be authorized to employ one assistant clerk during the sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress at a compensation of $6 per day, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, said compensation to begin from the time said clerk shall qualify as same.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors be authorized to expend not to exceed $150, as compensation for the employment of a stenographer and typewriter during the current session of Congress, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay to certain clerks of committees the salary earned by them as such clerks during the month of December last, as per statement of Henry Robinson, disbursing clerk of the House, attached thereto, the total amount being $274.99.

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1896.

SIR: As per your request I herewith inclose you a list of clerks to annual committees of the House who were appointed and subscribed to their oath of office in the month of December, 1895.

The statement shows the number of days that each was employed in said month, as well as the amount of salary due.

Very respectfully,

HENRY ROBINSON,
Disbursing Clerk House of Representatives.

Hon. J. FRANK ALDRICH,
Chairman Committee on Accounts, House of Representatives.

We, the subscribers, acknowledge to have received from Alexander McDowell, Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, the sums set opposite our respective names, in full of our salaries in the employment of the House of Representatives for the month of December, 1895.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move the adoption of the report which has just been read.

Mr. CRISP. Would it not be wise to have the report printed and lie over, so that we may understand its purport? It deals with a great many subjects.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. CRISP. We might take it up early in the morning.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will state for the benefit of the gentleman that there is no innovation in these resolutions—nothing that is really new. It seems to me the matter is one which we might well pass upon to-night. If any explanations are required, they can be given now.

Mr. CRISP. I do not know that I want to object; but here are a number of resolutions, some of which the committee approve and some of which they disapprove. We can not in this hasty way understand the exact purport of the report.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to its going over until the morning.

Mr. CRISP. And if there is no objection it might be well to have it printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is a privileged matter, and can be called up at any time.

Mr. BRUMM. There is one consideration in this case. The clerk of the Committee on Claims provided for by one of these resolutions has been at work the greater part of the session, but under the terms of the resolution his pay will not begin until he is sworn in.

A MEMBER. That makes a difference of only a day.

Mr. BRUMM. If the report is to be acted on to-morrow, the delay might not be a serious matter.

Mr. CRISP. Let the report go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire that the matter lie over?

Mr. CRISP. I should be glad to have that course taken, if it does not inconvenience the gentleman.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not see any harm in allowing it to lie over until to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman propose that the report be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CRISP. I think that had better be done.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD and will lie over until to-morrow morning.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, Mr. SHAFROTH obtained leave of absence for one week, on account of illness in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia, had asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. HANSBROUGH, and Mr. WETMORE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 862) for the relief of the receivers of the Towboat Association of New Orleans, La.; and

A bill (S. 1871) to provide for the punishment of offenses on the high seas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 477) to repeal section 553 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, requiring the district judge for the southern district of Florida to reside at Key West;

Joint resolution (S. R. 78) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute the medals and diplomas awarded by the World's Columbian Commission to the exhibitors entitled thereto.

The motion of Mr. LOUD was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an additional appropriation for the completion of the United States court-house, custom-house, and post-office building at Omaha, Nebr.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an additional appropriation for the completion of the United States post-office and court-house building at Kansas City, Mo.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of refunded customs duties for the year ended June 30, 1895, with an appendix thereto—to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, transmitting, with accompanying papers and volumes, a report of the action taken by the court and the conclusions arrived at, under direction of the act of Congress of August 5, 1886, entitled, "An act to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River Flats in the District of Columbia"—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4781) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River," approved February 18, 1893, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 689); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CURTIS, of New York, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan ordnance stores for military instruction in high schools, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 692); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1865) to authorize the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make certain disposition of condemned cannon, ordnance, guns, and cannon balls in their respective Departments, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 693); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. NOONAN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6505) to revive and reenact an act to authorize the construction of a free bridge across Arkansas River, connecting Little Rock and Argenta, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 716); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6304) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at Knoxville, Tenn., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 722); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. TRACEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6781) to extend the national boulevard at Springfield, Mo., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 724); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1646) providing for certain requirements for vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 726); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers," etc., approved March 2, 1893, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 727); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. TRACEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 2328) for the relief of Patrick Rainey. (Report No. 690.)

By Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on War Claims: A bill (H. R. 7093) for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas Antisell, deceased, in lieu of the bill H. R. 1375. (Report No. 694.)

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1896.

Prayer by Rev. WALLACE RADCLIFFE, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. HOAR, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the 9th instant, together with a draft of a bill to transfer the legal title and trusteeship of the land of the Sac and Fox Indians of Iowa to the Secretary of the Interior, and recommending favorable action by Congress; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant calling for information as to the reason the nonagricultural and unallotted lands of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation have not been restored to the public domain and proclaimed open to entry and location, as prescribed by sections 20 and 21 of the act of Congress approved August 15, 1894, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department," etc., transmitting a copy of the annual report of that Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, and calling attention to pages 10 and 37 of that report, which gives the information desired; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VEST subsequently said: Just before I reached the Chamber a communication was received from the Secretary of the Interior in regard to lands in the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, so called. I understand from the clerks that it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask that that action be reconsidered, and that the communication lie on the table until the return of the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The communication will lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 901) amending section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, reported it with an amendment.

EXPENDITURES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. PRITCHARD, from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 26th ultimo, directing the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment to investigate the expenditures of the Senate for the past year, reported it without amendment.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 666) to amend section 4829 of the United States Revised Statutes concerning surgeons, assistant surgeons, and other medical officers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to report it without amendment, and I ask that the bill be considered at this time. It concerns the management of the Soldiers' Homes and removes a restriction that interferes with the proper working of the Homes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 4829 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by the addition of the following words:

Provided, That surgeons, assistant surgeons, and other medical officers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and the several Branches thereof may be appointed from others than those who have been disabled in the military service of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALASKAN FUR-SEAL INDUSTRY AND SALMON FISHERIES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to print the reports, correspondence, charts, maps, and other documents now on file in the Treasury Department or other branches of the Government relating to the fur seal, salmon fisheries, and other matters pertaining to the Territory of Alaska; 3,000 copies to be printed, of which 750 shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 750 copies for the use of the Treasury Department and other Departments whose reports are thus printed.

STATUTES IN FORCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver, from the number now in his care, one copy of the compilated statutes in force in the District of Columbia to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, for his personal use, and 500 copies to the superintendent of documents for distribution to depositories of public documents: Provided, That the remaining copies of the work may be sold at $2.50 per copy.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2483) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to the New Hampshire Soldiers' Home; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2484) for the removal of the charge of desertion from the name of Mason W. Presby; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2485) to further protect the first day of the week as a day of rest in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 2486) for the relief of certain officers of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2487) providing for the establishment of a quarantine station at or near Astoria, Oreg.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHILTON introduced a bill (S. 2488) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Denison and Northern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes"; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. NELSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 96) declaring the lands within the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation in Minnesota to be subject to entry under the land laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 97) authorizing and requesting the President of the United States to inquire into the state of war now in existence in the Island of Cuba, and for other purposes; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to cause a thorough and rigid investigation to be made into the manner in which the war between Spain and the belligerents in Cuba is being conducted; whether the same is in accordance with the established rules of civilized warfare, and whether or not unusual and exceptional cruelties, barbarities, and atrocities are and have been practiced by either party toward the other, and particularly toward noncombatants.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying into execution the provisions hereof there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time as may be necessary to report such testimony as may be taken by the committee, or its subcommittees, in connection with appropriation bills, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently reported the resolution without amendment from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to inform the Senate of the present state and condition of the funds or annuities of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole tribes of Indians under the control of the United States, and for the future payment of which the United States is obligated by law or treaty.

CLARA YEARGIN.

Mr. IRBY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Clara Yeargin, widow of John W. Yeargin, deceased, late a laborer of the Senate of the United States, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate allowed by law to said laborer, out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate, said payment to be considered as in lieu of all funeral expenses or other allowances.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 227) to authorize the Auditor for the War Department to audit certain quartermasters' vouchers, alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5217) making one year's residence in a Territory a prerequisite to obtaining a divorce there; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 477) to repeal section 553 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, requiring the district judge of the southern district of Florida to reside at Key West; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 78) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute the medals and diplomas awarded by the World's Columbian Commission to the exhibitors entitled thereto.

KANSAS CITY, FORT SCOTT AND MEMPHIS RAILROAD.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 5382) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis Railroad Company to extend its line of railroad into the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. Is it a long bill?

Mr. BAKER. It is a short bill. It will only take a minute to pass it. It merely provides for the construction of 12 miles of railway from Baxter Springs, Kans., to Miami, in the Indian Territory. The bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] with an amendment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in section 1, line 8, after the word "Territory," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That such right of way shall be 50 feet in width on each side of the central line of the road. Said company shall also have the right to take and use for station purposes a strip of land 100 feet in width by a length of 2,000 feet in addition to right of way to an extent not to exceed one station for each 10 miles of road constructed within the limits of said reservations.

Th amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HAWLEY. The committee that arranges for the services of Senators upon committees was kind enough to put me upon six committees, all of them interesting. The Committees on Military Affairs and on Pensions together have an aggregate of very nearly half of the bills before the Senate. I am compelled to ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Connecticut is excused from further service upon the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent that the rules be suspended and that the Vice-President be authorized to fill the vacancy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair will appoint the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. PRITCHARD, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. HAWLEY.

THE WASHINGTON GAS LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. CALL. I submitted a resolution several days ago, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time. I suppose it will excite no debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The resolution submitted by Mr. CALL on the 9th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, directed to obtain from the Washington Gas Light Company and report to the Senate a statement, under oath, showing the amount of cash on hand on the 1st day of January, 1895, including money on deposit in banks and elsewhere. Also, a statement of the money received from consumers of gas. Also, how much money received from other sources, each to be given separately. Also, the disbursements of money and for what purpose. Also, the amount of money at the close of business on the 31st of December, 1895, including money in bank and elsewhere.

Mr. CALL. I merely wish to say that I presented the resolution by the request of a number of people who are greatly interested in this subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HILL. Let it go over until to-morrow. It might lead to some discussion, and there is a press of business this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5217) making one year's residence in a Territory a prerequisite to obtaining a divorce there was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

CONSIDERATION OF CUBAN RESOLUTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], coming over from a previous day.

The resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 9th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the consideration of the report of the Conference Committee on the Senate concurrent resolution 19, relating to Cuba, be postponed until Monday, April 6, and that the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed before that time to report to the Senate the facts which, in their opinion, justify the passage of said resolution, together with the evidence thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the conference committee recommend to the Senate the adoption of some resolutions passed by the House of Representatives as an amendment to a Senate resolution on the same subject. I wish to read the first and last clauses of the House resolutions:

Resolved, etc., That in the opinion of Congress a state of public war exists in Cuba, the parties to which are entitled to belligerent rights, and the United States should observe a strict neutrality between the belligerents.

The last clause of the final resolve is as follows:

The present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens, by intervention if necessary.

Mr. President, I do not suppose that at my time of life I have need to make any proclamation of my sympathy with any people struggling against oppression. If anybody in this country doubt where my personal sympathies are likely to be in such a struggle, I presume the doubt will not be removed by my own certificate.

I authorized my colleague, being unfortunately absent when both the votes that have been had in the Senate on the two great questions relating to our foreign relations have been taken, to announce my pair in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] requesting the President to use his friendly offices between Spain and her insurgent subjects to bring about the recognition of the independence of the people of that island. My colleague very kindly executed the commission, and the doctrine of that resolution I stand by and am prepared to defend, if necessary.

I have also no sympathy with the men anywhere who denounce every assertion of the dignity of this country or every utterance of American patriotic feeling as jingoism, a phrase borrowed, where they get most of their political ideas, from the English press. They are a class of persons who are an injury to any cause they espouse. They excite my indignation and dislike more when they happen to be on my side than when they are against me. They are a class that exist in England as well as here. They do more than all the jingoes that ever existed to set these two countries against each other and to make them misunderstand each other. Their constant misrepresentation excites in the mind of many of the English people a contempt for the American character, and produces utterances there which create a just, righteous, and most natural indignation here. They keep up their strident and querulous grasshopper chirp, filling the fields with their noise, till they almost persuade the people of England to take as true their representation of the United States and the people of the United States to take as true their representation of England. Mr. Arnold Foster, an eminent English member of Parliament, has well described the difficulty they create in the proper and decent management of the foreign affairs of England. He is speaking of the English complication with Russia when he says:

The work of influencing British public opinion in favor of a rapprochement with Russia has been made more difficult by the unfortunate advocacy of certain professional champions of Russia. The mixture of patronism and misrepresentation, the childish misstatements, the invariable defense of the indefensible, and the unctuous praise of what is least praiseworthy, have done more to keep alive distrust and dislike in this country than any overt act of the Russian Government. Mercifully, these guiding voices have been comparatively silent for some time past, and public opinion is left unprejudiced in presence of the problems which confront it.

Mr. President, if they have been mercifully silent in England they have been very lively of late in this country, and their utterances everywhere are nothing but mischief.

I mean, I wish to assure my honorable friend from Ohio, no disrespect to the Committee on Foreign Relations itself, a committee great in its functions, and great also in the character of the gentlemen who compose it. Certainly I mean no disrespect to my honorable friend from Ohio. He is in my judgment the most illustrious public character on the political stage upon this continent to-day. I sometimes differ from him, but always with a huge respect. I said yesterday that he must have been experimenting with the X rays when he undertook to penetrate my brain and perceive and declare my motive before I had declared it myself. I was confirmed in that conjecture when I read the report of Professor Tesla's account of his experiments in the paper this morning. He says that when he experiments with them and exposes himself to them "they occasion in him a great tendency to warmth in the upper part of the head;" and I was sorry to see yesterday that my honorable friend from Ohio had had the same experience. [Laughter.]

I wish, Mr. President, to speak very briefly in behalf of the orderly and decorous conduct of the foreign affairs of this Government. I suppose that no Senator will question that we are dealing with a weighty matter. Now, whether it be right or wrong, I think it is a serious and most lamentable fact when the educated youth of Spain, to whom this Republic ought to be as a beacon light, in whose ingenuous studies the history and the example of the United States ought to take the place which the history and the example of Greece and Rome took to their predecessors and to our predecessors, are brought into a state of mind in which they are ready to insult and trample upon the flag of the United States, a state of mind which has rendered the minister of this Republic unsafe in his house, and has compelled him to send his wife and children away, if the stories are correctly reported, to a place of safety.

I think, however much we may condemn it, that it is to be lamented when the Spanish minister, a gentleman of personal accomplishment and the representative of a friendly power, our ally and friend in the war of independence, and a power which when the secret history of the time of our war is made known exercised a potent influence in preventing armed intervention by France and Great Britain in our day of peril—I say it is a lamentable state of things, whoever be to blame, when that accomplished foreign minister is stung into breaking over diplomatic propriety and making his appeal in an irregular way to the people of the country.

Mr. President, we must do our duty with courage and firmness. I only am saying that we ought so to do it as to avoid these provocations, if we can, and that whatever we do should be done in a calm, quiet, dignified spirit as befits great actions of a great people. We ought to imitate not the excitement of mobs, we ought to indulge not in the impassioned eloquence of orators, not in stimulant appeals to the love of liberty or to any other popular passion, good or bad. It is a time and an occasion for the exercise of the judicial faculty. The court, the tribunal of justice, jurisprudence, is the place where we ought to seek our example, our model, and our guide.

Now, Mr. President, the question of belligerency, with which this first resolution deals, is a question of fact to be drawn and inferred and established by inference from other facts. Does anybody doubt that? If that be true, is it not also true, as I suggested yesterday, that when this body of 89 men, Senators, representatives of sovereign States, exercising a large influence in the conduct of affairs, not only of this continent but of the world, are to deal, are to act, is it not reasonable that we should at least take the precaution which we take whenever any sum of $50 is to be taken from the Treasury of the United States in behalf of a claimant; that is, that we should have before us not the reports of consuls, not merely the dispatches of consular agents, but that we should have before us the finding of what those facts are by some committee of this body who have investigated the subject?

What have we here? The Committee on Foreign Relations discussed this matter more or less at length at their discretion in their committee room, and then they are represented here, without any report, without any finding of facts, by their former chairman, the honorable and distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], whom we so much respect, in an impassioned speech, the two principal features of which were, first, that he declared that in supporting this resolution he brought in somewhere a sword, which he laid upon the table for Spain to take up if she saw fit. I wonder how long that Senator would hesitate in asking his country to take up the sword if the prime minister of England, or her head of the foreign office, had said he laid down a sword for the United States to take up if she saw fit. The other feature of the Senator's speech was an equally earnest claim that, in his opinion, the Congress of the United States had the right to declare war under the Constitution without the assent of the President.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I am informed that a resolution has been before the Committee on the Judiciary for quite a while, which proposes to settle the question as to whether such a resolution as we are now discussing——

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that is a fair interruption. I thought the Senator rose to ask a question.

Mr. MORGAN. I wanted to ask the Senator if there was such a resolution pending before the committee, and how long it has been there?

Mr. HOAR. Well, Mr. President, that is another thing. What I have to complain of is that in dealing with this great question of nations and of centuries, when we are pleading for a little gravity and a little deliberation and a little knowledge, one Senator thinks he has made a good answer by interrupting me with a taunt about some telegraphic dispatch that I sent in regard to my own individual action, and another Senator thinks he has made a good answer by getting up with a taunt about the delay of the Judiciary Committee in dealing with some public question.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. If he will allow me, I was merely bringing up a pertinent matter. I have been expecting a report from the Committee on the Judiciary upon this very interesting constitutional question, and the Committee on Foreign Relations had to determine the question before them without having the views of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. But the Senator had determined it and stated his opinion upon it.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all.

Mr. HOAR. And argued it at length.

Mr. MORGAN. As I had a right. I had a right to my own opinion, as you have to yours, and I stated it. If you will now state yours, I will be satisfied.

Mr. HOAR. Very good. Mr. President, when that is pointed out, the chairman of the committee brings in a document which he says was printed for the use of the committee and from which he read in his speech, and the document turns out to be a statement of the agent or counsel of the Cuban belligerents. He does not say what the answer to it is, or whether there is any answer, or whether the other side has been heard; he does not say whether that committee have found that a single statement of fact in that document be true or false. It was considered reason for an outburst of indignation all around the Senate when the Spanish minister stated that some of us, in his judgment, had been misinformed about an imputation of cruelty on the part of his Government—a minister, representing a friendly country, accredited to the people and to the Government of the United States by his Government; and yet the Committee on Foreign Relations asked this body to act on the statement of the counsel of the unrecognized, unincorporated, unorganized, unnational belligerents; and that without giving it even the indorsement of the committee which produces it, and that is all we have got of the facts except——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to correct the Senator, if he will allow me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. The paper which I presented—the honorable Senator was absent during the debate and when the paper was being prepared—had been printed for some time for the use of the committee, and has been ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. That paper comes to us, not from any agent, but it comes from the Secretary of State, communicating all the papers in the possession of the State Department upon the subject of the present outbreak, and among them the narrative——

Mr. HOAR. But, Mr. President, that is not the point, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to finish the sentence?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that the committee did furnish all the evidence we could obtain from the Secretary of State of an official character regarding the subject, and we submitted that with our report to the Senate. More than that we could not do. If the Senator had been here, he would have had the opportunity of getting this information, and would not have made complaint.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then we have the declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the floor of the Senate that all the evidence they had—because he says they furnished all they had—was a communication furnished by the Secretary of State from the agent or counsel of the insurgents as a matter of mere information, without any indorsement of the Secretary of State, and without any finding by the committee itself whether a single statement of that paper was true or false.

Mr. SHERMAN rose.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to be interrupted. I want to make my statement connectedly. The Senator will have an opportunity to reply. I can not make my point if I am to be constantly interrupted.

Mr. President, let me ask you [the Vice-President in the chair], let me ask any Senator who does me the honor to listen to me, this question: Suppose a fifty-dollar claim were to be acted upon, and my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] said, as he would be pretty likely to say, "I should like to hear the report of what the committee has found the facts to be in that case," and the answer was, "There is not any report"; but the chairman of the committee gets up and says, "Here is the brief that the counsel on one side sent in, which was printed for the use of the committee." "Has your committee found the statements of that brief to be true?" "Oh, no." "Has any Senator had an opportunity to see it before the debate?" "Oh, no; it was printed for the use of the committee." Do you not think, sir, there would have been made a motion to recommit, pretty unanimously supported, and that a Senator would say, "I can not, under my sense of public duty, take $50 from the Treasury of the United States for the poorest widow in the country without more careful inquiry into the facts than that"? Yet we are asked to decide this great question of international law, and to say to Spain that we may have to intervene, if necessary, on no other finding of the facts by anybody.

I was very much impressed by another thing, which shows you in this matter the heat and rapidity and carelessness which have almost turned the Senate of the United States, I will not quite say into a mob, but you remember, Mr. President, that James Madison said such was the force of associated action that if every Athenian citizen had been a Socrates every Athenian assembly would still have been a mob. We are not exempt from that danger.

I was struck, I say, with something which happened during the eloquent and impassioned speech of the honorable Senator from Alabama. He read a statement from a historian about the recent operations against the insurgents in Cuba a few years ago, and said that—

The Spanish minister admitted that in that war, in addition to 13,600 Cubans who had been killed in battle, 43,500 prisoners had been put to death.

Mr. MORGAN. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I did not say what he is reading from the RECORD. I said that it had been asserted in a book or on an authority.

Mr. HOAR. I am going to state that.

Mr. MORGAN. You are not stating now what is a fact.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator said:

Can it be possible that a mistake is made by an accurate and able historian when he says to us, etc.

Thereupon the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] rises and says that he "failed to catch the name of the authority for the wonderful and horrible statement which the Senator from Alabama" had just read to the Senate. So that it had not been a matter of much consideration in the Committee on Foreign Relations, for my honorable friend from Maine did not even know the name. Then the Senator from Alabama said:

Mr. MORGAN. I am sorry that for the moment I can not recall his name. I will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. FRYE. It is from history?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; deliberately written, and written by a Spaniard.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator credit it?

Mr. MORGAN. For a long time I hesitated to credit it, but I had to credit it or else deny the evidence of a deliberate statement made by a historian in a book of universal acceptance, one of reliable authority.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Alabama state the name of the historian or the book?

Mr. MORGAN. It is in the American Encyclopedia, under the title of "Cuba."

Then the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], whom we all know to be one of the most kind-hearted and excellent men who ever lived, rises and says:

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I will read a very short extract from a publication by Mr. Clarence King.

Then the Senator from Alabama says:

Mr. MORGAN. I shall be very glad to have it read.

The Senator from Florida then says:

Mr. CALL. Jesus Rivocoba, one of the officers on duty in the service of Spain in the Island of Cuba, under date of September 4, 1869, writes this letter.

Then the Senator from Florida is asked by another Senator, who, I think, is also on the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]:

Mr. WHITE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida from what he has read? What is the paper he has in his hand?

Mr. CALL. I read from a pamphlet published by Clarence King. The article appeared in The Forum for September, 1895, and purports to contain a literal copy of the letters of those officers themselves.

Mr. President, I am not for one prepared to put this country into a war on the united authority of Jesus Rivocoba, the historian, whose name the Senator from Maine does not know, and the Senator from Alabama (who has forgotten more than all the rest of us put together know) has forgotten, and an article in the Forum by Mr. Clarence King; and if there is a single fact which at the close of all these speeches my honorable friend can say his committee have considered and weighed the evidence on both sides, and are prepared now, as the eyes and ears of the Senate, to affirm what they have found true, I fail to recall it or to have heard it; and if any single Senator can recall, or has heard of it, I think he would be likely to state it at some time before this debate is over.

I ask, again, if this were a fifty-dollar claim of a Massachusetts widow, and the committee had been asked for a report, and they said they had not any report, and were asked what facts they found which justified the fifty-dollar payment and said, "There is a letter from Jesus Rivocoba somewhere [laughter], and an article in the American Encyclopedia entitled 'Cuba,' and there is a privately printed paper which we had before us by the counsel for the widow"—I think that case would be recommitted to the Committee on Claims without any further debate.

We have, of course, the correspondence from the consuls—and that I ought not to omit; that has official weight—but the committee have not found what of those facts they found correct; they have not found how extensive they are. They relate to a comparatively small part of that island. They have not found whether the Spanish Government makes any answer to them or not, and they are, in my judgment, totally insufficient to support this proceeding.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to refer him to another document?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator yields to me. The Senator yesterday asked me for the document from the Secretary of State, which I gave him. I hold in my hand, however, a printed document, a message from the President of the United States, sent to us on the 11th of February, 1896, containing 212 pages.

Mr. HOAR. That is the very thing I am talking about at this moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; that was before us all the time.

Mr. HOAR. That is exactly what I am saying; I have just been saying what the Senator interrupts me to state, and I think it unfair to rise and interrupt me to say what I am saying. The honorable Senator reproaches me for not knowing what had been printed for the use of this committee when I was absent in Massachusetts, and now he does not know what I have been saying for the last five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. HOAR. Let me repeat——

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me state my position. The Senator was complaining of the want of information and that the committee did not set out a formal report, which is not usually done, by the Committee on Foreign Relations at any rate. But here is a document of over 200 printed pages, which have been open to the Senator ever since the 11th of February last.

Mr. HOAR. I have a great mind to ask the Reporter to get up and read what I have been saying for the last five minutes, but perhaps I can condense it a little.

I have been observing that there was one document, which I ought not to pass over, which had been laid before the Senate; that it was a document containing the correspondence with consuls and consular agents in Cuba, and that this document is in answer to this resolution:

That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate, etc., copies of all correspondence in regard to our affairs in Cuba.

This is February last.

Mr. PLATT. That was sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. That is a document communicated to the House of Representatives, not communicated to the Senate, but to which undoubtedly every Senator has had access. But, as I have proceeded to observe, the committee have not found what of these things are true and what are not true. They have not found whether the matters had been brought to the attention of the Spanish Government, or of Spain, and they relate at best and at most to a very small portion of the territory of that island.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me there, I will say, as he was not here at the time of the debate previous to the vote taken, that the debate was almost entirely controlled and participated in by members of the Foreign Relations Committee. I do not recall that in that debate a single member of that committee ever referred to that document or cited it in support of the position of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I do not believe that there are ten Senators who had ever heard of it. Whether the Committee on Foreign Relations have read it, I have no means of knowing.

Mr. MORGAN. What document is that?

Mr. HOAR. The correspondence of the consuls in Cuba communicated to the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORGAN. I must have read thirty or forty extracts from that in the report which I made on my feet here at the order of the committee in this case. The Senator never reads my speeches, and, of course, does not understand what I said.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend from Alabama undertakes to break the force of what I have had the honor but imperfectly to say by saying that he made the report upon his feet here.

Mr. MORGAN. How is that?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator speaks of the report he made while on his feet.

Mr. MORGAN. My speech was intended to be a report of the action of the committee and the grounds of its action; but the Senator has never read it.

Mr. HOAR. Then if the speech of the Senator from Alabama was a report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Foreign Relations now are inviting us to lay down this sword for somebody to take up; and the Committee on Foreign Relations think that Congress can declare war without the assent of the President. I should like to ask my friend from Ohio whether he would agree to say that he or his committee ever authorized the Senator from Alabama to report to the Senate that we had a right to declare war without the assent of the President?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I do not think the Senator from Alabama made the statement in that way at all.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Ohio did not hear the Senator from Alabama five minutes ago state that he had a right, because the Judiciary Committee had not submitted a written report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think we had the matter before us at all.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then I think the Senator from Alabama was not making a report from the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator will allow me to make a statement in justice to myself and to him. In the speech I made I intended to lay down the ground upon which the committee had acted and upon which they intended to act, so far as it could be gathered. I said that the question of whether or not the President of the United States had the right to consider the concurrent resolution we were adopting was not presented in the resolution, and therefore it was unnecessary to discuss it. But I was asked by the Senator from Massachusetts himself certain questions before he left the Senate and went off, which I felt it my duty to respond to, which involved the one I have discussed on my personal account, and in which I expressed my opinion personally, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who was sitting by me at the time, rose after I had closed my remarks, and in his speech he said also that the question was not up; but the Senator from Massachusetts had called for it and I felt bound to answer it.

Mr. HOAR. Then, Mr. President, I hope when the resolution is passed the committee will kindly inform the Senate what portion of the speech of the Senator from Alabama is the report of the committee and what portion of it is his private finding of facts.

It seems that the account of the Spanish atrocities read from the historian never had been heard of before even by the Senator from Maine. So that will not pass as the report of the committee. That very interesting fact that Spain had murdered 45,000 prisoners and killed 15,000 soldiers in battle was not called out by my question. Is that part of the report of the committee or no?

Mr. MORGAN. That was not a part of the report of the committee at all.

Mr. HOAR. Then I think the subject——

Mr. MORGAN. But in the argument of this case I came across that fact in the American Encyclopedia, and called the attention of the Senate to it. I remarked at the time that I felt embarrassed about it, or some remark like that, because it was a fact of such enormity that I could scarcely credit it; but the friend of the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Dupuy de Lôme, refers to that and puts the blame of it upon General Sickles, our former minister to Spain. I leave the Senator to wrestle with General Sickles about it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, a man who is so easily overthrown in wrestling by the honorable Senator from Alabama has not the courage to tackle General Sickles.

But I come to a little graver point than this. I ask the Senator if it be not true that this resolution which we are asked to adopt is a denial of as well-established and as long-established and as impregnable a rule of international law as can be found in all jurisprudence, and a denial of a rule of international law which we insisted upon during our own rebellion, to which the United States committed itself in its instructions to our ministers at the great courts not only of France and England but of Spain herself, and to which, if we are pledged to anything by our national history, by our national honor, by the utterances of our statesmen and sages, we are pledged? This declares that the parties in Cuba are entitled to belligerent rights, and if there be any doctrine of international law which is not only well settled, but to which the United States is committed, it is the doctrine that parties are not ever entitled to belligerent rights under any circumstances, and that the granting them to an insurgent populace or people or district or state or island is solely a matter for the consideration of the government that recognizes them, with reference to its own interest and duty and desire and convenience.

I am taking more time than I intended, but I want to read what a few only of the authorities say on this subject. Now, Mr. President, here is what Mr. Fish said, which he sends to Mr. Motley to be read in the ear of Great Britain as our doctrine on this subject, quoted in the first volume of Wharton's Digest, section 69, page 513:

> The President does not deny, on the contrary he maintains, that every sovereign power decides for itself, on its responsibility, the question whether or not it will, at a given time, accord the status of belligerency to the insurgent subjects of another power, as also the larger question of the independence of such subjects and their accession to the family of sovereign states.
> But the rightfulness of such an act depends on the occasion and the circumstances, and it is an act, like the sovereign act of war, which the morality of the public law and practice requires should be deliberate, seasonable, and just, in reference to surrounding facts.

"Deliberate." I am afraid that word is new to the vocabulary of my honorable friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and my honorable friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

> National belligerency, indeed, like national independence, being but an existing fact, officially recognized as such, without which such a declaration is only the indirect manifestation of a particular line of policy.
> But circumstances might arise to call for it. A ship of the insurgents might appear in the port of the neutral, or a collision might occur at sea, imposing on the neutral the necessity to act. Or actual hostility might have continued to rage in the theater of insurgent war; combat after combat might have been fought for such a period of time; a mass of men may have engaged in actual war until they should have acquired the consistency of military power, to repeat the idea of Mr. Canning, so as evidently to constitute the fact of belligerency, and to justify the recognition by the neutral. Or the nearness of the seat of hostilities to the neutral may compel the latter to act; it might be his sovereign duty to act, however inconvenient such action should be to the legitimate Government.

Mr. Fish says:

> The question of according or withholding rights of belligerency must be judged, in every case, in view of the particular attending facts. * * * This conflict must be one which will be recognized in the sense of international law as war. Belligerency, too, is a fact. The mere existence of contending armed bodies and their occasional conflicts do not constitute war in the sense referred to.

I should like to ask the Secretary to read the last paragraph on page 515 and two or three lines at the top of the next page from President Woolsey.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

> There may be a difficulty in ascertaining when the fact of war begins, and this difficulty is the greater in cases of insurrection or revolt, where many of the antecedents and premonitory tokens of war are wanting, where an insurrection may be of little account and easily suppressed, and where war bursts out full-blown, it may be, at once. Our Government has more than once professed to govern its action by the following criteria expressed in Mr. Monroe's words relating to the Spanish South American revolts: "As soon as the movement assumes such a steady and consistent form as to make the success of the provinces probable, the rights to which they were entitled by the law of nations, as equal parties to a civil war, have been extended to them." But this rule breaks down in several places. The probability is a creature of the mind, something merely subjective, and ought not to enter into a definition of what a nation ought to do. Again, the success does not depend on steadiness and consistency of form only, but on relative strength of the parties. If you make probability of success the criterion of right in the case, you have to weigh other circumstances before being able to judge which is most probable, success or defeat. Would you, if you conceded belligerent rights, withdraw the concession whenever success ceased to be probable? And, still further, such provinces in revolt are not entitled by the law of nations to rights as equal parties to a civil war. They have properly no rights, and the concession of belligerency is not made on their account, but on account of considerations of policy on the part of the state itself which declares them such, or on grounds of humanity.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Secretary, read the last sentence again about the belligerents having no rights; and I ask the Senate to be good enough to listen to it.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Would you, if you conceded belligerent rights, withdraw the concession whenever success ceased to be probable? And, still further, such provinces in revolt are not entitled by the law of nations to rights as equal parties to a civil war. They have properly no rights, and the concession of belligerency is not made on their account, but on account of considerations of policy on the part of the state itself which declares them such, or on grounds of humanity.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to know whether it be not a matter of some little gravity for 45 American States here represented to declare against that statement of one of the foremost jurists of the world, President Woolsey, that that is an entire mistake and is not the international law. He says that insurgents are not entitled thereto as rights. This declaration, if we make it, is to come back to plague us for a thousand years. If every insurgent government has belligerent rights to which it is entitled, it has a right to hold us accountable, if we deny or refuse them, when it gains its independence. We are involved necessarily. If it is entitled, as you declare, to these rights we are involved necessarily, by the inexorable law of nations, more than that, by the more inexorable law of duty, in every struggle hereafter the world over.

I do not think that Mr. Jesus Rivocoba, I do not think that Mr. Clarence King, I do not think that the article by the historian whose name we have forgotten in the Encyclopedia Americana is quite sufficient authority to warrant the Senate of the United States in overruling this great authority in international law.

You are asked, and I want this thing distinctly understood, to put the seal of your condemnation on the doctrine on which Lincoln and Seward and, four or five years after, Grant and Fish stood in two of the most important crises in our national history. There is another thing which I should like to ask the Secretary to read, and that is the note of my honored and beloved friend Richard Dana, one of the most accomplished and able men whom this country ever had in its service, to Wheaton's International Law. This doctrine of Mr. Dana was cited by Sir Alexander Cockburn at Geneva in the great arbitration proceeding there. Lord Cockburn says—the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] calls my attention to it—that this doctrine has been "nowhere more fully and ably or more fairly stated than by Mr. Dana."

I ask the Secretary to begin two paragraphs down on the page I have indicated and to read through.

The Secretary read as follows:

> The occasion for the accordance of belligerent rights arises when a civil conflict exists within a foreign state. The reason which requires and can alone justify this step by the Government of another country is that its own rights and interests are so far affected as to require a definition of its own relations to the parties. Where a parent Government is seeking to subdue an insurrection by municipal force, and the insurgents claim a political nationality and belligerent rights which the parent Government does not concede, a recognition by a foreign state of full belligerent rights, if not justified by necessity, is a gratuitous demonstration of moral support to the rebellion and of censure upon the parent Government. But the situation of a foreign state with reference to the contests, and the condition of affairs between the contending parties, may be such as to justify this act. It is important, therefore, to determine what state of affairs, and what relations of the foreign state, justify the recognition.
> It is certain that the state of things between the parent state and insurgents must amount, in fact, to a war, in the sense of international law—that is, powers and rights of war must be in actual exercise; otherwise the recognition is falsified, for the recognition is of a fact. The tests to determine the question are various and far more decisive where there is maritime war and commercial relations with foreigners. Among the tests are the existence of a de facto political organization of the insurgents sufficient in character, population, and resources to constitute it, if left to itself, a state among the nations, reasonably capable of discharging the duties of a state; the actual employment of military forces on each side, acting in accordance with the rules and customs of war, such as the use of flags of truce, cartels, exchange of prisoners, and the treatment of captured insurgents by the parent state as prisoners of war; and, at sea, employment by the insurgents of commissioned cruisers, and the exercise by the parent Government of the rights of blockade of insurgent ports against neutral commerce, and of stopping and searching neutral vessels at sea. If all these elements exist, the condition of things is undoubtedly war; and it may be war before they are all ripened into activity.
> As to the relation of the foreign state to the contest, if it is solely on land and the foreign state is not contiguous, it is difficult to imagine a call for the recognition. If, for instance, the United States should formally recognize belligerent rights in an insurgent community at the center of Europe, with no seaports, it would require a hardly supposable necessity to make it else than a mere demonstration of moral support. But a case may arise where a foreign state must decide whether to hold the parent state responsible for acts done by the insurgents or to deal with the insurgents as a de facto government. (Mr. Canning to Lord Granville on the Greek war, June 22, 1826.) If the foreign state recognizes belligerency in the insurgents, it releases the parent state from responsibility for whatever may be done by the insurgents, or not done by the parent state where the insurgent power extends. (Mr. Adams to Mr. Seward, June 11, 1861, Dip. Corr., 105.) In a contest wholly upon land, a contiguous state may be obliged to make the decision whether or not to regard it as a war; but, in practice, this has not been done by a general and prospective declaration, but by actual treatment of cases as they arise. Where the insurgents and the parent state are maritime, and the foreign nation has extensive commercial relations and trade at the ports of both, and the foreign nation and either or both of the contending parties have considerable naval force, and the domestic contest must extend itself over the sea, then the relations of the foreign state to this contest are far different.

In such a state of things the liability to political complications and the questions of right and duty to be decided at once, usually away from home, by private citizens or naval officers, seem to require an authoritative and general decision as to the status of the three parties involved. If the contest is a war, all foreign citizens and officers, whether executive or judicial, are to follow one line of conduct; if it is not a war, they are to follow a totally different line. If it is a war, the commissioned cruisers of both sides may stop, search, and capture the foreign merchant vessel, and that vessel must make no resistance and must submit to adjudication by a prize court; if it is not a war, the cruisers of neither party can stop or search the foreign merchant vessel; and that vessel may resist all attempts in that direction, and the ships of war of the foreign state may attack and capture any cruiser persisting in the attempt. If it is war, foreign nations must await the adjudication of prize tribunals; if it is not war, no such tribunal can be opened. If it is war, the parent state may institute a blockade jure gentium of the insurgent ports, which foreigners must respect; but if it is not a war, foreign nations having large commercial intercourse with the country will not respect a closing of insurgent ports by paper decrees only. If it is a war, the insurgent cruisers are to be treated by foreign citizens and officials, at sea and in port, as lawful belligerents; if it is not a war, those cruisers are pirates, and may be treated as such. If it is a war, the rules and risks respecting carrying contraband, or dispatches, or military persons come into play; if it is not war, they do not. Within foreign jurisdiction, if it is a war, acts of the insurgents in the way of preparation and equipments for hostility may be breaches of neutrality laws; while, if it is not war, they do not come into that category, but under the category of piracy or of crimes by municipal law.

Now, all citizens of a foreign state, and all its executive officers and judicial magistrates, look to the political department of their Government to prescribe the rule of their conduct in all their possible relations with the parties to the contest. This rule is prescribed in the best and most intelligible manner for all possible contingencies by the simple declaration that the contest is or is not to be treated as war. If the state of things requires the decision, it must be made by the political department of the government. It is not fit that cases should be left to be decided as they may arise, by private citizens, or naval or judicial officers, at home or abroad, by sea or land. It is, therefore, the custom of nations for the political department of a foreign state to make the decision. It owes it to its own citizens, to the contending parties, and to the peace of the world, to make that decision seasonably. If it issues a formal declaration of belligerent rights prematurely, or in a contest with which it has no complexity, it is a gratuitous and unfriendly act. If the parent Government complains of it, the complaint must be made upon one of these grounds. To decide whether the recognition was uncalled for and premature requires something more than a consideration of proximate facts and the overt and formal acts of the contending parties. The foreign state is bound and entitled to consider the preceding history of the parties, the magnitude and completeness of the political and military organizations and preparations on each side, the probable extent of the conflict by sea and land, the probable extent and rapidity of its development, and, above all, the probability that its own merchant vessels, naval officers, and consuls may be precipitated into sudden and difficult complications abroad. The best that can be said is that the foreign state may protect itself by a seasonable decision, either upon a test case that arises or by a general prospective decision; while, on the other hand, if it makes the recognition prematurely, it is liable to the suspicion of an unfriendly purpose to the parent state. The recognition of belligerent rights is not solely to the advantage of the insurgents. They gain the great advantage of a recognized status, and the opportunity to employ commissioned cruisers at sea, and to exert all the powers known to maritime warfare, with the sanction of foreign nations. They can obtain abroad loans, military and naval materials, and enlist men, as against everything but neutrality laws; their flag and commissions are acknowledged, their revenue laws are respected, and they acquire a quasi-political recognition. On the other hand, the parent Government is relieved from responsibility for acts done in the insurgent territory; its blockade of its own ports is respected; and it acquires a right to exert, against neutral commerce, all the powers of a party to a maritime war.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is not here. This statement of Richard Dana is a summing up by one of the ablest lawyers the country ever contained of what he knew of the doctrine on which this country went through the rebellion. My honorable friend from Ohio stands worthily, and will worthily go down in history, by the side of the very greatest of the great men of that great day. His name will stand with that of Lincoln and Grant and Fish and Seward and his own illustrious brother as the men to whom God in His providence and in His bounty committed the great task of saving the life of the great Republic when it was in peril—of more than that, of saving the principle and the last hope of human liberty on the face of the earth. I trust that if my honorable friend has unguardedly and without sufficient reflection placed himself now in a position where he is asked to come in and wash out as with a wet sponge the great diplomatic achievements and glory of that great time, he will recede from his position, and that he will prefer to go down in history by the side of the men whose names I have called rather, even, than in the delightful companionship of my honorable friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

But, Mr. President, this resolution not only wipes out from international law, from the pages of the American jurisprudence, one of its great principles, but it does it timidly, hesitatingly, ineffectively. Mr. Dana says in the passage which has just been read that the decision must be made by the political department of the Government. That political department of the Government is Congress, the two Houses acting together, acting by resolutions or votes to which their concurrence is constitutionally necessary, and in such case the Constitution provides that before this nation can act, the act of the two Houses must be approved by the President of the United States or passed over his objections by a two-thirds vote.

Now, our honorable friends come in here and shrink—I will not say flinch—from sending their declaration where it can alone have any political effect. They undertake to make this utterance in a way that will accomplish all the mischief that it is capable of, and have none of its vigor, potency, or effect. It is not the act of the American people. It is not binding on any single American citizen. It is not binding on the President. It is not binding on either House of Congress. It is not binding on any member of Congress. It is not binding for any future year. It is a declaration to which the Constitution adds in letters that can not be effaced, "This means nothing; it has no power." The President of the United States alone can give it life and vigor and potency and authority, and the committee, when they wrote the word "concurrent" at the top of that resolution, wrote in brief these words: "It is distinctly to be understood that this is a Pickwickian resolution, without vigor or potency or meaning. We have not dared to tell Spain that we recognize the insurgents as belligerents and are prepared to take the consequences. We have not dared to give the President of the United States the constitutional authority to protect any American citizen. We give Spain the right of search in terms, but if she undertakes to exercise it we can turn upon her and say, 'This did not mean anything. It was [to use the phrase of my honorable friend] merely moot court debate, brought in to see which member of the Senate or of the other House could make the most eloquent and inspiring speech; but it had no constitutional effect on the great question of war or peace or foreign policy or international relations.'"

Mr. President, I do not wish to make any suggestion of anybody's motive, and I do not do it; I disclaim it; but I could not help thinking of a definition of circumstantial evidence which a bright old Democratic judge in my State of Massachusetts once gave. There was a case tried in East Cambridge, where the courthouse is a mile from the Charlestown Navy-Yard, which my esteemed colleague and I know as the plague of our lives. A case came up where the evidence was circumstantial, and counsel on both sides made a great handle of that. The judge said: "Gentlemen of the jury, there is no great mystery about this matter of circumstantial evidence. There are certain facts which when they exist satisfy us as a matter of human experience that other facts exist also in their neighborhood. Therefore when you have proved one, it is circumstantial evidence of the other. For instance, if you should see great activity in the navy-yard over here to-morrow that would be circumstantial evidence, not that a war is approaching, but that an election is approaching." [Laughter.]

I have sometimes—I say it with all friendliness—been inclined to think that when you saw uncommon activity in our grave, reverend, and somewhat sleepy Committee on Foreign Relations, and my honorable friend the Senator from Ohio came into the Senate in a state of extraordinary excitement, interrupting everybody else who tried to make a speech, it was circumstantial evidence not that there was any great trouble as to our foreign relations, but that a Presidential election was at hand. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I do not think this thing ought to be done unless it is to be done. As Shakespeare says—

> If it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well
> It were done quickly.

This thing is not to be done. Nobody proposes to do it. It is put into this form in order to avoid doing it and not to do it, and that is all there is of it.

It does not, as I said, bind any Congress, present or future. It does not bind the President and it does not bind the people. If any unhappy manufacturer or maker of arms, encouraged by this resolution, goes down to Mobile and sells them to a Cuban insurgent, or sends them from New York, and sets up in his defense that his Government has declared that those people are belligerents, he is liable to be indicted and convicted for a breach of our neutrality laws next week, just as he would have been last week before the resolution was passed. There is nothing in the resolution but a snare and a delusion, both to Cuban insurgents and to that class of our citizens who sympathize with them and wish to trade with them. Is not that so, my honorable friend from Ohio? Is there any doubt about that legal proposition?

Now, there is but one organ of this country to foreign countries, and that is the Executive. He can not declare war and he can not make laws regulating commerce except as a part of the legislative power of the country, but everything else is his. It is for him to make treaties; it is for him to appoint and receive ambassadors, and it is for him, as it has been the custom of this country for a hundred years, to determine the question of recognition or of belligerency. When the French ambassador called on Daniel Webster in Mr. Fillmore's time and hoped he would not recognize prematurely the new revolution, Mr. Webster said, "Why, my dear sir, we have recognized the First Consul, and we have recognized the Emperor, and we have recognized the Directory, and we have recognized the first Republic," and he went over about forty different governments they have had in France, every one of which had been recognized by the President of the United States, when this Republic, on the policy that you now seek to depart from, had stood secure and at peace and in quiet for nearly a century.

As I said, Mr. President, neither the pulpit, nor the press, nor the two Houses of Congress, nor anybody else, has any authority over this matter unless the President concur. It is only the opinion of certain very respectable gentlemen in a very excited frame of mind. That is all there is of it.

Now, when this country wants to act, let her act with all her force. As I said yesterday, if we have any diplomatic knots to cut, let the two halves of our shears act together, President and Congress, and cut them, and not undertake to have one-half, separate from the other, doing the work. Scissors will not operate either in politics or in any other place in the world in that way.

You are doing all mischief and you are doing none of the good when you adopt this method of procedure.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I wish to say about this resolution, though I think a good many more things might be said. But I wish to say one thing for myself, which perhaps will not get much sympathy anywhere, about the general question of our foreign relations. I do not like this constant meddling anywhere with the great diplomatic discussions of the Government.

Now, take the Venezuelan matter. I think it was quite proper before it came up that Congress should make a temperate reaffirmance of the Monroe doctrine and send it to the President for his support and approbation. I like the resolutions which my esteemed colleague [Mr. LODGE] introduced and what he said in support of them, as I like almost everything that he does. I do not quite like this particular resolution, as I have observed. But when that had been done and the President of the United States had conveyed to us the fact that he and the Secretary of State were having an important and delicate discussion with Great Britain, I think the pulpit, and the press, and the college professors, and Representatives, and Senators had better let it alone and leave it to negotiation. I do not like this hurrying to send messages to England of how much we love her. I do not like this sending messages across the Atlantic or these passionate utterances of what a horrible thing it would be to have a war and that we would not have one under any circumstances.

Mr. Olney has got a very good head, in my opinion. I do not agree with him in politics, but he is a good, square, honest, clear-headed, old-fashioned Massachusetts Yankee, and I am willing to trust him with the diplomacy of this Government.

They say that the President's message contained a menace of war with England. England does not seem to understand it so. But supposing it did, he has said it in the face of the civilized world and he has said it in the rightful exercise of his authority and discharge of his duty as the Chief Executive of this Republic, and to humiliate him for it or to condemn him for it is to humiliate America and condemn America in the face of the nations of the world.

There is not any danger of war with England. We do not mean to make war with her, and she does not mean to make war with us. When the President of the United States, in discussing the question whether John Bull was crowding a little American State out of her rights, utters a phrase which can not be recalled, I think we had better hold our peace, if we do not like it, and go on with the negotiations.

Mr. President, I remember reading a story of the first Napoleon which I am sometimes reminded of in these criticisms of the Chief Magistrate. He was walking one day with a beautiful lady of high rank, when a workman came along with a heavy burden on his shoulder. The haughty beauty kept the narrow path and was for making the poor man step out, that she need not soil her dainty shoes by stepping into the mud. "Madam," said the Emperor, "respect the burden." When this great controversy with Great Britain is going on, I feel, political opponent as I am of President Cleveland, like saying to these American critics in the pulpit and in the press, "Respect the burden."

Mr. President, I had a few thoughts more which I should like to have expressed to the Senate on this subject, but the time has come when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] desires to proceed, and I will not undertake to detain the Senate any further. I will leave off whenever the Chair is ready to lay before the Senate the business which comes up at 2 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not quite time yet, the Chair will state to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire what will become of the pending resolution at 2 o'clock? There are other Senators who desire to say something upon it. I wish that it might retain its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that under the rule the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts will go to the Calendar at 2 o'clock unless it is otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that he ask that the resolution may retain its place without any prejudice.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to take the floor on the resolution to make some remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I have not yielded the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has not yielded the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought he was through.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want my friend from Ohio to thrust in a motion to lay the pending resolution on the table before the Senators who wish to speak on it have been heard. He does not propose to do that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not, but I wish to state to the Senate that I propose to keep, if possible, the privileged question, the report of the committee of conference, before the Senate, and to call attention to the fact that all the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts could have been made just as well upon the question of concurring in that report. But as this resolution was introduced, as I suppose, for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Massachusetts to make his speech, I did not complain of it, except I thought that the Senate ought to proceed in the ordinary way and, instead of discussing this moot question, discuss the real question involved.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought that we should proceed to the business of the Senate in its order. He having been gratified by an opportunity to make his speech, I will yield with pleasure to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], that he may conclude his speech upon the Delaware election case.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to say that I concede I could have made the motion to postpone on the conference report, but it would not have been in order to have added to a motion to postpone instructions to the committee to report in the meantime their conclusions of fact. It was necessary, therefore, in order that the Senate might have the right to give the committee that instruction, the conference report being up, that I should do it in this form. Otherwise I should have addressed the Senate on the Cuban resolution. All that I desire now is that this resolution may go over. Of course it goes to the Calendar and must be taken up by a vote of the Senate. I desire that it shall go over in the ordinary way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that objection was interposed to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island. That will take the resolution to the Calendar. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. HOAR. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] the floor upon the resolution when it is called up?

Mr. COCKRELL. It can not come up except on motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submitted to the Senate the request of the Senator from Rhode Island, and an objection having been interposed, the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts under the rule goes to the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon from the Committee on Privileges and Elections February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I closed the portion of my remarks last evening by introducing the credentials of Senator Watson of the State senate of Delaware, together with the journal of the State senate, showing that he had been admitted and sworn and seated as a member upon those credentials, and upon the authority of the case and under the power already quoted, I maintained the position that his being seated as a member and acting as such on his credentials continues his right and title as a member, and extends his membership until the record of the State senate of Delaware shows some resolution, order, or judgment adverse to his right or title as a senator.

Very near the close of my remarks I was asked by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] whether the record of the Senate in this case did not show certain facts, the death of the governor and the appointment of the speaker pro tempore in place of the regular speaker. I admit, as I did then admit, in answer to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the record of the Delaware senate shows those facts. Upon those facts we draw the conclusion of law that the additional duties of the executive authority devolved upon Mr. Watson as speaker of the senate. That is the conclusion we draw. The conclusion which the majority of the committee draw is that these additional duties of the executive and the appointment of a speaker pro tempore either vacated the office of speaker and of a senator or suspended the functions of speaker or senator. These are both conclusions of law directly opposite, drawn from the same state of facts.

But, sir, the fact that the record of the State of Delaware is evidence of this fact is not sufficient to determine the question here in argument nor is the conclusion of law drawn either way sufficient to determine it. There are only two questions for determination here which I wish to state. For example, the fact that the record shows certain facts simply dispenses with the proof of those facts. The facts themselves are not an order, judgment, or resolution. It is the old case long ago put of a man having a promissory note in his pocket upon which he could procure a judgment. The evidence of the debt is not a judgment of it because the grounds for a judgment do not have the effect of a judgment or order of a court.

The case is put that this fact is shown by the record. I will make the facts apparent by the record in the other case. Suppose a cognovit is filed for the purpose of taking a judgment by confession. Suppose it is regularly verified and acknowledged under the law of the State where it is proposed to operate and placed on file, then the grounds of the judgment appear on the record. There is no judgment yet. I will go further, because there are actual experiences and decisions on the point. Suppose the copy of the note is spread at large upon the record; there is the evidence on the face of the record. It is the same as the evidence in this supposed Delaware case is on the face of the record. So there is the evidence of the debt acknowledged to be due on the record. Here is the evidence that the speaker pro tempore was appointed in place of the regular speaker on the record, and here is the evidence that the regular speaker has devolved upon him the duties and the executive functions on the face of the record.

Now, neither the record nor the face of the record, nor the fact that the evidence of these facts is upon the record, has the force of a judgment. There must still be in the one case the action, order, and judgment of the court. Although the evidence is in the record, as in the other case, there must be the action, judgment, or order of the house, notwithstanding that the facts are on the face of the record.

In the first place, I will state the material question in this case. It is a question to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate because although the learned Senator from Oregon devoted a very large portion of his speech to the discussion of questions incident to it he avoided the material question in the case. He took as much care to do it as the Delaware constitution does to avoid naming as governor the substitute for governor. He took as much care to do it as the act of Congress of 1886 does to avoid calling the substitute for the President President or of recognizing him as such.

That question is this: Does the record of the Delaware senate show any action, order, or resolution of the house upon the facts conceded to be upon the face of the record? That question can only be answered in the negative. It does not show anything of the kind. That is the question, and it makes no difference for the purpose of this argument whether the Senator is right in giving two or three constructions or whether we are right in giving one construction to the constitution of Delaware; whatever may be our construction, the question is, Did the Delaware senate make any order, decision, judgment, or resolution upon the question? It did not.

Upon that question I wish to introduce the next authority. It is from Cushing's Manual. I think I am entitled to call it a classic authority on the subject of parliamentary law and parliamentary privilege. This book was not written with any purpose and could not possibly have contemplated any purpose except to state the law as it is and has been and will continue to be in these cases. This book was not written with any reference to the question in the Du Pont case. Let us see now what the author states as the parliamentary law without exception in reference to the necessity of a judgment, order, or resolution of the house upon facts, no matter how evident they may be:

Whenever a member ceases to possess those qualifications which are in their nature continuing, or which members are expressly required to possess during their continuance in office—as, for example, when a member removes from the State or other local constituency in which he is required to continue to reside whilst in office—the seat of such member is thereby liable to be adjudged vacant, upon the fact of such disqualification being brought to the knowledge of the assembly.

It is liable to be adjudged vacant; it is not yet vacant.

To the disqualifications of this kind may be added those which result from the commission of some crime which would render the member ineligible, or from some gross official or other misconduct, in consequence of which he is expelled, or discharged from being a member. In all these cases, unless there is some express provision of law, by which the subject is regulated, the fact of disqualification can only be inquired into and decided upon by the assembly itself.

Not by the Senate of the United States, not by any other court or tribunal, but by the senate of the State of Delaware. Let me read a little further. I read from page 195:

The distinction has already been explained between those offices or employments, the possession of which at the time of the election renders a person ineligible, and those the functions of which are merely incompatible with the functions of a member; the former avoiding the election, the latter only preventing the person elected from exercising the functions of a member until they are removed. When, however, a member has once been duly elected and taken his seat this distinction no longer exists, the acceptance of disqualifying and incompatible offices being equally effectual to create a vacancy.

The only practical question in cases of this kind usually relates to the time when the acceptance of an office takes place. The subject is sometimes regulated by law, but where this is not the case it may be considered as a rule, founded in the reason of the thing and corresponding with the practice, so far as it is known, of all our legislative assemblies, that in order to vacate the seat of a member by the acceptance of a disqualifying or incompatible office the election or appointment thereto alone is not sufficient, but the member must either have signified his acceptance of the office in a formal manner, or have done what is incumbent on him to qualify himself to discharge its duties, or have actually entered upon their discharge. In cases of this kind the existence of the vacancy must be declared by the assembly itself.

No matter if he has accepted the office; concede, for the sake of argument, that the construction put upon the Delaware constitution by the majority of the committee was right; no matter if Mr. Watson did actually accept an office; concede that; the fact that he did so accept and that he thus vacated the office he held as a senator and as speaker, must be declared by the house itself. What is the use of all this discussion about the constitution of Delaware, about the question of constitutional law? What purpose does it serve? Either of these constructions of the constitution with respect to this authority may be well founded; the real question is, Did the State senate of the State of Delaware declare the vacancy? They did not. They declared nothing on the subject.

In the case arising under this and the preceding section—

Cases disqualifying by crimes or removal of residence, or the accepting of an incompatible office. Those are the cases—

In cases arising under this and the preceding section there is, in fact, no vacancy until it is so declared or implied by the resolution of the assembly itself.

So when we concede for argument's sake that the facts upon which they base their construction, that there was either a vacancy, a suspension, or an abeyance of the functions of State senator or speaker by the acceptance of this office, using the phrase simply for the purposes of argument, on behalf of Mr. Watson, then there must be upon such facts a resolution declaring the vacancy, and no vacancy exists until such resolution or order of the house is entered upon the journal.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Would it lie in the case of death?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir. There the death is noticed always. Here the death is noticed. It is very short; it is a brief order. All that is necessary in this case to conclude everyone was for the State senate of Delaware to pass a resolution—not impracticable, not long, not irrational—

Resolved by the senate, That the Hon. William T. Watson, having had devolved upon himself the duties of the executive authority temporarily, until a governor may be elected in the place of Governor Marvil, who is deceased, his seat has become vacant in this house.

That would be the resolution of the assembly, and that is the only thing which would create a vacancy. There is no amount of argument, there is no amount of inference, there is no amount of reasoning, there is no amount of construction or misconstruction that at all affects his seat until the vacancy be declared by the house of which he was a member. Then, and not till then, it is vacant.

The second question in the case, which the Senator from Oregon also has studiously avoided, is whether the Senate of the United States, the State senate of Delaware not having acted, can now here declare a vacancy to have existed in the senate of the State of Delaware. That must be answered in the negative. This court has never enacted such a thing; this court has never resolved such a thing, nothing like it, nothing resembling it. My honorable friend from Oregon, however, answers this by a qualified negative. He says it is true as to matters of fact; but as to questions of law, and especially of constitutional law, there remains with us a right and power to declare a vacancy or a suspension or a state of abeyance.

Now, I wish to come to that position. I have here the thirteenth volume of the Reports of the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan. I wish to read from it an opinion by Judge Cooley, a jurist of national and international reputation, the opinion on which Judge Brewer, in the Kansas case cited yesterday, founded his decision. This opinion is right to the point, that the house or the senate of the State legislature is the judge, the exclusive judge, both of questions of law and questions of fact in determining the qualifications, elections, and returns of their own members. It had been argued differently in that case, and to that argument and to that position the judge directs his opinion in these words:

It is a sufficient answer to this argument, that, while the constitution has conferred the general judicial power of the State upon the courts and officers specified, there are certain powers of a judicial nature, which, by the same instrument, are expressly conferred upon other bodies or officers; and among them is the power to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of members of the legislature. The terms employed clearly show that each house, in deciding, acts in a judicial capacity, and there is no clause in the constitution which empowers this, or any other court, to review their action.

"Any other court." You are now sitting, sir [Mr. SEWELL in the chair], in one of the tribunals characterized by the expression "any other." There is no power in the supreme court of the State of Michigan, or any other tribunal, or in the court of the Senate of the United States, there is no power in this court or any other to review the decision.

The "general superintending control" which the supreme court possesses under section 3 of Article VI of the constitution, "over all inferior courts," does not extend to the judicial action of the legislative houses in the cases where it has been deemed necessary to confer judicial powers upon them with a view to enable them to perfect their organization and to perform their legislative duties. The houses are not "inferior courts," in the sense of the constitution, but, as legislative organizations, are vested with certain powers of final decision, for reasons which are clearly imperative.

It may happen, as suggested in the argument, that when each house, not only deciding for itself questions of fact, but also construing for itself the law, we may sometimes witness the extraordinary spectacle of the two bodies construing and enforcing the law differently, while a third construction is enforced by the courts upon the public at large. But with this possibility in view, the evils of allowing the courts a supervisory power over the decisions of the houses upon the admission of members are so great and so obvious that it is not surprising that the framers of the constitution refrained from conferring the power. The supervision could not ordinarily be exercised during the session of the legislative body, and to correct the decisions afterwards by annulling the laws passed would only be to substitute a great public evil for that which might have been a wrong to an individual member and to the district which elected him, but which could seldom affect the State at large.

In can make no difference that in this case according to the pleas, the question passed upon by the house was purely a question of law.

It is claimed here that this case is purely a question of law; but I do not myself believe that there is any disputed facts in the case of Mr. Du Pont, the claimant from Delaware.

What is the jurisdiction of the State legislature in such cases? The Senator from Oregon says that we can revise them; that it is not exclusive. Judge Cooley, sitting as chief justice of the supreme court of Michigan, says:

It can make no difference that in this case, according to the pleas, the question passed upon by the house was purely a question of law. The question of the legal election of a member is usually a question compounded of law and fact, and the house must necessarily pass upon both.

That is the very position which I took yesterday.

If we have the power to review the decision in one case we have in all. If we can correct their erroneous construction of a law we have the same power to correct any erroneous decision upon returns, qualifications, or majorities. It is sufficient for us to say that the constitution has not conferred upon us this jurisdiction, and whether the decision made is right or wrong we shall leave it where it has been left by the fundamental law of the State. (13 Michigan Supreme Court Reports, p. 342.)

I will supplement that for the present by noticing how exactly this doctrine is supported by Mr. Justice Brewer in the case cited yesterday. After citing what I call the qualification clause in the State constitution, the same as in the constitution of the State of Delaware, the judge goes on to say:

This is a grant of power and constitutes each house the ultimate tribunal—

What is the meaning of "ultimate?" Is there anything after the end? What comes after the last? "Ultimate" is the last. Is it possible to conceive of a tribunal in existence which comes after the last?

This is a grant of power, and constitutes each house the ultimate tribunal as to the qualifications of its own members. The two houses acting conjointly do not decide. Each house acts for itself, and by itself; and from its decision there is no appeal.

That is the meaning of "ultimate."

Not even to the two houses. And this power is not exhausted when once it has been exercised, and a member admitted to his seat. It is a continuous power, and runs through the entire term—

For which he was elected—the four years; in Watson's case a continuous power. This exclusive and ultimate power to pass upon the elections, qualifications, and returns is continuous. It is a shield thrown around the member of the legislative assembly of which he can not be deprived, except by an order or judgment of the house of which he is a member.

At any time, and at all times during the term of office, each house is empowered to pass upon the present qualification of its own members.

The constitution of Kansas provides that, ipso facto, when a member of the legislature accepts a Federal office, his seat becomes vacant; yet this house went on and recognized a member and refused to oust him who had accepted a Federal office. What is the decision upon that state of facts?

By section 5 of the same article, acceptance of a Federal office vacates a member's seat. He ceases to be qualified, and of this the house is the judge. If it ousts a member on the claim that he has accepted a Federal office, no court or other tribunal can reinstate him. If it refuses to oust a member, his seat is beyond judicial challenge.

This is the meaning of "ultimate;" this is the meaning of "exclusive," that even while a legislature decides wrong, while it decides against the constitution of its own State, where the legislative order of the house is in plain violation of the constitution of the State, yet the member, if not ousted by order of the house, continues to be a member, and his acts are held to be valid. That is the doctrine of Mr. Cushing; that is the doctrine of Judge Cooley; that is the doctrine of Judge Brewer. There is no contradiction of the doctrine by any respectable authority anywhere. Not within the metes and bounds of parliamentary law in free governments will you find a case contradicting these authorities.

This grant of power is, in its very nature (and so as to any other disqualification), exclusive; and it is necessary to preserve the entire independence of the two houses. Being a power exclusively vested in it, it can not be granted away or transferred to any other tribunal or officer.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator a question, as he is arguing that point very earnestly, and very ably and learnedly?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the doctrine for which the Senator is contending go any further than this, that in the case of certain facts occurring which in law would make a vacancy, the State senate in the case of a State senator is the exclusive judge of that fact?

Mr. TURPIE. Most certainly it does.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me a little further——

Mr. TURPIE. The honorable Senator will allow me. He puts a question, and now I wish to answer it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Very well.

Mr. TURPIE. Most certainly it does, because all three of the decisions say that questions, both of fact and of law, before the house may be passed upon by the house, and if they are passed upon by the house it is exclusive; there is no appeal; it is an ultimate decision. And if they be not passed upon by the house, that gives the United States Senate no jurisdiction.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Another question, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Suppose in case a State senator dies and the State senate finds that fact and spreads it on its record, but refrains—if the Senator will allow me to use that word to-day——

Mr. TURPIE. It is your own word, not mine.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Refrains from declaring that there is a vacancy; in other words, the senate declines or hesitates or refrains from declaring the effect of that death, would the constituency from which that man was sent to the senate be bound so that they could not send a successor there, or would that kind of a decision by the senate bind anybody or any tribunal; that is to say, they find the facts all right, but they apply the law all wrong?

Mr. TURPIE. It would bind everybody.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think not.

Mr. TURPIE. You have no authority for that opinion except your own.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. TURPIE. I will suppose a man is dead, or I will suppose what the Senator did the other day, that he is in the penitentiary, or I will suppose he has been elected President of the United States, no matter where he may be, or whether or not he was in existence at all, unless there be an order of the house recognizing the vacancy—which might not be expressed; it might be simply made that a writ issue to the county of Kent to elect a succesor—unless there be some such order the vacancy does not exist.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me one other question, and then I shall not go any further? Suppose there is a statute of the State of Delaware declaring that no felon should sit in the legislature of the State, and one of the senators is found guilty of murder or some other felony, and sentenced to the penitentiary. The State senate, when they come to consider whether or not there is a vacancy there, finds the fact of the conviction and of the sentence; but they follow up that finding of fact by a declaration that there is no vacancy. Is that binding?

Mr. TURPIE. That is thoroughly binding; and there is a great deal stronger case put by Justice Brewer.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I insist it is not binding. There is where we differ.

Mr. TURPIE. There is a great deal stronger case to which I will call the attention of the court. I speak it advisedly, for we are sitting as a court. I will call the attention of the court to the case decided by Judge Brewer. There a person accepted a Federal office who was a member of the legislature, and the constitution of the State in such an instance provided that he thereby vacated his seat ipso facto. The legislature adjudged that the seat was not vacated. The court says that the judgment of the legislature is final, ultimate, and, however erroneous it may be, it can not be revised or reviewed.

I will take another case, a stronger one than that put by the learned and honorable Senator. Here is a man who died, and whose death is known, and the house or senate of the legislature deeming it necessary for some purpose of their own—I will not inquire into the motives; the Senate of the United States never does—that a vacancy shall not be declared in that case. They may spread the fact of his death upon the record, and take a person who is a living person, and personate the person who has died, seat him, and recognize him as the person who has died—that could not be inquired into by the United States Senate nor by any other court.

There is no escape from this grant of absolute power to a legislature to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members. That power is continuous. It continues with the member through his whole term; it allows no question as to the member's title to be raised in the Senate of the United States, nor in any court or tribunal, except in the house of the State legislature to which he belonged. There the question may be raised and decided. If it be decided, the decision can not be reviewed or revised, and if no question be raised, the member holds under the first adjudication when he was admitted upon his credentials.

One of the positions taken by the learned and honorable Senator was that if a constitutional question came up that that gave the Senate of the United States the power to adjudge it. Why, sir, there are very few contested cases here that have not some constitutional question in them. My own case, to which I have referred, had a very grave constitutional question in it, and the record of the committee will show it. It was this, whether the person who pretended to have been elected lieutenant-governor, or who had been elected by the people, or a person who had been elected by the senate as president pro tempore had the right to organize the State senate. That is a constitutional question as grave, and I think more grave, than the constitutional question here involved in respect to the construction of the fundamental law of Delaware.

The State senate of Indiana took that question under consideration and decided that the president pro tempore of the senate was the proper officer to organize the senate, and the Senate of the United States declared that they would not inquire into that decision, and did not give any opinion about it. There was no occasion that we should. It was expressly prohibited and forbidden by their own constitution, and by the constitution of every State in the Union.

The question in the Kansas case, to which I have so often referred, was a constitutional question, a purely constitutional question, under the constitution of the State of Kansas, as to how many should constitute the house of representatives, whether 125 or 129, and if there had been seats and constituencies that adjudication would have been final and not inquired into; but as there was no subject-matter upon which the adjudication could operate, the court went on to determine it, but respecting a State printer and the validity of a law, but not with respect to the title of a member.

There was a constitutional question in the Kansas case, in which I have read the opinion of Judge Brewer, exactly constitutional and precisely constitutional, as to whether a member of the legislature, having accepted a Federal office, could continue his service in the house of which he was a member. The constitution of the State declared not, and the house of which he was a member decided that he could. The court decided that the judgment of the house could not be inquired into, the constitution of the State to the contrary notwithstanding. The constitutional question is simply a question of law, but when Judge Cooley in the Michigan decision determined that this power extends to all questions, both of fact and of law, he makes an end of constitutional questions. They are questions of law, and the power of the legislature to determine them is as absolute as it is upon the question of fact. Both fact and law are exclusively and ultimately determined by the house of which the person in interest is a member.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator kindly give me the number of the Kansas report which he quoted from a moment ago?

Mr. TURPIE. Twentieth Kansas Reports, pages 554 and 555.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TURPIE. The case of Bateman, to which I will allude, in the sequel involved the question of constitutional power. It was whether, under the statutes of the State of New Jersey, a member of the legislature could vote for himself as United States Senator and could elect himself—purely a question of law. If the distinguished Senator wishes to be refreshed upon the subject of incompatibility of offices, let him look at that case. There it was claimed, and was most fully demonstrated from the decisions of the common law and judgments of the common law courts, that a man who occupied a representative capacity could not at the same time be an elector and a candidate; yet the senate of New Jersey decided that he could be both a candidate and an elector, and allowed him to vote for himself, and the United States Senate declined to inquire further; they would only look to the question as to whether he voted and acted as a member; and if he were a member, recognized as such and acting and voting as such, and voted for himself, that was ultimate. He was seated here. There was no review of it upon any ground, notwithstanding the constitutional objection which might have been made to it under the law of the State of New Jersey.

I might cite a variety of other cases in which constitutional questions have occurred or questions of law. Not one case can be found which supports the position of the honorable and learned Senator, that the legislature is to judge only of facts. Every decided case determines the question, and determines the question against the honorable Senator that the legislature is the exclusive and ultimate judge both of the facts and law of the case before them.

After offering the journal yesterday to show that the credentials of Mr. William T. Watson had been presented, and to show that he was admitted and sworn, and was subsequently elected speaker of the senate, I wish to refer again to the case of Clark and Maginnis as to the effect of this action by the senate of Delaware. I quote from the decision in that case. Speaking of credentials, the decision says:

> Their title is not, as is sometimes carelessly said, a prima facie title. It is an absolute title, continuing until the house itself has adjudicated that some other person be admitted to their place. This adjudication is only operative for the future, and has no retroactive effect whatever. When the house makes the inquiry on the merits, it may treat the credentials as prima facie evidence upon that question. But until the house tries the case the credential is conclusive to all the world. (Case of Clark and Maginnis v. Sanders and Power, p. 637.)

And, again:

> Every act of the assembly in which they take part, and to which their consent is necessary, has as absolute validity as if their title had been affirmed by an adjudication of the house itself.

That is the effect of the admission of a member upon credentials to a legislative body. That is not a decision of any court of a State or of the United States; it is the decision of the Senate of the United States sitting as a court in such a question as this.

I ask then, further, what were the acts of Mr. Watson during that session from the first day to the last, to be accompanied always with the corollary that such acts "are as valid as if his title had been affirmed by a formal adjudication of the house"? The learned and honorable Senator from Oregon stated in behalf of the majority committee, as an extremely material and important position in this inquiry, that Senator Watson had not been recognized by the senate of Delaware after the devolution upon him of the duties of the executive office. I do not admit that by any means; but, supposing for the sake of argument that it were true, it is not at all material to the decision of this case. He needed no recognition. His first admission to the assembly, his credentials, his recognition there, continuous as they were, shielded him for every day of his term, lasting four years, against all assaults, unless there was an order of the senate affecting his title and his right to vote and act as a member thereof.

It is not necessary, after a person has been admitted here or in any other legislative body to sit as a member, that he should come every day and have a recognition. It adds nothing to the validity of his seat; it adds nothing to the validity of his title, or that he should come here once a week, or once a month, or once a year, or that he should come here at all. The title of William T. Watson as a senator of the State of Delaware having been once recognized and adjudged upon his first admission to that body continues with him and for him until the expiration of his term, and there is no right of subsequent recognition by that body which would add anything to the strength of such title or add anything to his functions as a senator. There may be action of the body adverse to his title, but the record shows none, and it can only be shown by the record.

Granting, however, for the sake of argument, that this is a material question, that he ought to have been subsequently recognized at some time, at some period, let us now look at the evidence with respect to that. Let us look at some of the acts of Mr. Watson. I mean those acts which he did after the devolution upon him of the duties of the executive office. I mean the things done by himself, by his fellow-members, by the officers of both houses, for he was speaker of the senate; the things done after the function of the office of the executive had befallen him.

A great number of affidavits have been read here, and I said yesterday that I did not think there is any very great importance to be attached to them upon either side. Gathering, though, from these affidavits the things which occurred, and especially the acts of Watson, I think it must be admitted, I think it must be conceded, this much at least, that on the 9th day of May, the last day of the session, the day on which the joint ballot was taken for United States Senator, a little before noon, Senator Watson entered the senate chamber in Dover; that he approached the speaker's stand; that when he reached the speaker's chair Mr. Records, the speaker pro tempore, was occupying the chair, and the senate, with all its members present, was in public open session. What occurred? The pro tempore speaker, the lawful presiding officer of the State senate of Delaware, left the chair, yielded it to Mr. Watson, and Mr. Speaker Watson took the chair and sat therein. I am not now going to say whether he voted or whether he made any motions, or whether he received any motions, or whether he put any questions, or whether he took any part in the legislative business of that session. I do not assert it, but I think no one can deny the fact I have stated, that he did take the chair, and after he had occupied it for two or three minutes he made the announcement, "The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the senate will repair to the hall of the house of representatives for the purpose of balloting for United States Senator." That much is true; that much is undisputed.

Now, sir, we have heard much in this country about the want of respect for law, the lack of reverence for law and the consequent disobedience and disregard of law. Sometimes it has been said that the only place in which any respect is shown for law and and the administration of it is the courts of the country. I disclaim that statement. I think there is just as much express respect and honor paid to the law and the administration of the law in the legislative assemblies of the country as there ever has been in the courts, and, Mr. President, I do not believe there is a legislature within the metes and bounds of the Government of the United States which would have allowed its presiding officer to seat a stranger not a member of the house in its chair. There might have been no protest, there might have been no objection. There would have been no time for protest. The sergeant-at-arms and the senators who sat near the intruder would have rushed at him and cast him out. There is no house of any legislature, small or great, new or old, which for a moment would have tolerated the usurpation of its presiding chair by a stranger, by an intruder, by a usurper. When the State senate of Delaware did recognize the acts of its own speaker pro tempore, in yielding the chair and allowing Senator Watson, the regular speaker, to take it, they did make a recognition, there was a recognition by the senate of Delaware in open session in the most public manner, without protest, without objection, of his right not only as a senator in that body but as the presiding officer of the body. I care not how long the recognition lasted. That is not material. One glimpse of the true Prophet is as good as a lifetime survey of him. We have that one fact then in favor of any subsequent recognition, if it were material at all.

Then, again, Mr. President, I read from the journal of the Senate:

> The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the senate, preceded by the speaker and attended by the clerks and sergeant-at-arms, proceeded to the hall of the house of representatives for the purpose of voting for United States Senator, in obedience to the act of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," passed July 25, 1866.

Had the senate adjourned? No, sir. Had the senate ceased to exist? No, sir. The senate was in life, the senate was in presence, the senate was in assembly, and preceded by the speaker of the senate—the same Senator Watson—passed through the hall to the hall of the house of representatives, accompanied by its officers and by the sergeant-at-arms. Why does the sergeant-at-arms accompany this procession of the senate to the hall of the house? Many of us have seen that. Why is it? It is for the special purpose of preventing any stranger from intruding into the line. It is that upon a moment's warning, upon the notice of a wink, the sergeant-at-arms shall remove such intruder and prevent him from accompanying the senate to the hall of the house of representatives. What body was it—was it a body—which went to the hall of the house of representatives? The senate. Not the senators, not the members of the senate, but the senate of the State of Delaware, preceded by the speaker and accompanied by the clerks and sergeant-at-arms, proceeded to the hall of the house of representatives. That procession was an act of the senate; that procedure was a procedure of the senate; that progress was a progress of the senate, and the leader in the procession and in the proceeding and in the procedure was William T. Watson, recognized as such, declared to be such, acquiesced in as such, acknowledged to be such, confessed to be the speaker of the senate of Delaware.

There is another fact in the case of subsequent recognition, if subsequent recognition were necessary. There is another act of Mr. Speaker Watson which has all the validity under the ruling of this body that could be given it by a formal adjudication of the State senate of Delaware. If the State senate of Delaware had deemed it necessary, or anyone had deemed it necessary, and they had passed a resolution saying "We acknowledge that William T. Watson is the speaker of the senate, and we direct that he go at the head of the procession when we proceed to the hall of the house of representatives," that would have been an express adjudication. The United States Senate has decided that his title to act as speaker and as senator is as valid as if it had been expressly adjudicated.

Now, let us look a little further at the acts of Mr. Watson. "The two houses, being convened in joint session, proceeded, according to the provisions of the Constitution and the laws of the United States, and the laws of Delaware, to ballot in joint session for United States Senator. The speaker of the senate directed the clerks to call the roll of the respective houses, and the members, as their names were called, responded by a viva voce vote, as follows." Who directed the clerks? The speaker of the senate. The clerks of the house? Yes. The house was organized against Mr. Watson. It was in the hands of his political opponents. The senate was in the hands of his friends. If there had been any question about his right to act as senator and speaker when he directed the clerks of the house to call the roll respectively, why did not the clerks of the house insist that he was not speaker, that he was not senator, that he was not a member at all, that he was a mere intruder, and that they would not act under his direction and would not recognize his authority? There was no such declaration. On the contrary, they obeyed, they recognized him, they confessed; they denied not; they confessed that he had the authority to direct that the roll of the house should be called, and the roll of the senate should be called, and every member of the senate, and every member of the house recognized again his authority as a senator and as speaker of the senate when they answered to the roll call. The journal shows that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him a question at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. TURPIE. Allow me to ask the honorable Senator to contrast now his conduct with mine.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I stated at the outset that I would not interrupt——

Mr. TURPIE. Contrast it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That I would not interrupt the Senator if he declined. I understand him to decline.

Mr. TURPIE. I am not going to decline. I am going to make a contrast. The Senator from Oregon shall have all the time he wants.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Indiana can make all the contrasts he pleases.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am trying to treat the Senator from Indiana with respect——

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; with the utmost respect.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. As I always treat every Senator.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir. So do I.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I stated in the first instance that if the Senator did not desire to be interrupted I would not interrupt him.

Mr. TURPIE. I answered that I did not.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Now the Senator is quibbling, and wants to raise a question.

Mr. TURPIE. No, sir. The quibble is yours; it is all your own—it is not mine.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Now I shall not interrupt the Senator any more.

Mr. TURPIE. I am very glad. I hope the Senator from Oregon will keep his promise.

Nevertheless, I am going to make the contrast. The learned and honorable Senator from Oregon argued this case eight hours, and I heard every word of the argument. I could repeat most of it if it were necessary. I never interrupted him once; I never dreamed of interrupting him. I knew I was to follow him. He, as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, has a right to follow me, and he will follow me.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I certainly shall.

Mr. TURPIE. He will have an opportunity to reply to anything I have said or to any statement I have made. How unreasonable—I will not say discourteous—it is, and how sharp the contrast is between my conduct in this debate and the conduct of the honorable Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the Senator from Indiana insist that I have done anything outside of the parliamentary rule? If he means to say that, I denounce the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. TURPIE. Did not the Senator——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. As dealing in unparliamentary language.

Mr. TURPIE. I have not used any unparliamentary language. Let me remind the Senator of his promise just now made not to interrupt me, broken already.

I was going on to show some other acts of subsequent recognition. I say that every senator and every member recognized the authority of Mr. Watson as a member of the senate and as speaker of the senate to answer to his name when it was called under his direction and by pronouncing the name of the candidate for United States Senator for whom he desired to vote. The record shows the entire vote. It shows the presence of 30 members. Under whose direction did they answer? Whom did they recognize as speaker of the senate? The names of the senators were called by the clerk of the senate. The senate was there. It was still in existence. The joint session was composed of the two houses. They were both there, and the names of senators were called by the clerk of the senate and under the order of the speaker of the senate, and every senator who answered, and they all answered, recognized the authority of the speaker of the senate to direct the calling of his name. That was another act of William T. Watson and another acknowledgment, a confession, public confession, open confession of his right and title to sit as a senator and to preside as speaker of that body.

There is another act of Mr. Watson to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. It is a crucial act. It is an act which every legislator or jurist in the world would call the test act in this eventful history. As I said, all the names of all the senators were called and each voted on the call. The ninth person who voted on the roll call was Mr. Speaker of the senate. "The speaker of the senate directed the clerk to call the roll of the respective houses, and the members of the same as their names were called responded by viva voce votes, as follows."

Then the senators were called and their votes recorded, and, as the ninth in order, Mr. Speaker of the senate, as a member of the senate is called to vote for his choice as United States Senator, and he responds by naming Edward Ridgely, and the clerk so records it. There is a recognition of record, not only public, notorious, confessed, acquiesced in, but recorded in the journal of the house and in the journal of the senate of Mr. Watson as a senator and as speaker of the senate. Something else was also recognized and recorded. The honorable Senator from Oregon claims that at this time there were but eight persons who were members of the Delaware State senate. The record kept both in the journal of the senate and house shows on its face that there were 9 senators present on that day and that each of the 9 voted for United States Senator for twenty-eight times on that day and these votes were counted and recorded. The record is true. It needs no verification and admits of no contradiction. This act of Mr. Senator Watson, like all the other acts I have named, is, to use the words of authority formerly referred to in the case of Sanders and Power, the vote of Mr. Watson for Edward Ridgely for United States Senator—has as absolute validity as if his title had been affirmed by an adjudication of the house itself. That is the decision of the United States Senate upon the nature of that act.

This act of his was repeated twenty-eight times that day. There were twenty-eight formal, public, open, undeniable recognitions by the senate, by the officers of the senate, by the house, by the officers of the house, by everyone who could lawfully recognize Mr. Watson as a senator and as speaker of the senate. And here was a public, open, and recorded declaration of the Delaware senate that the senate at that time consisted of nine members, and that one of this number was William T. Watson.

The learned and honorable Senator from Oregon does not recognize him as such. Mr. President, it makes no difference whether he does or not. He is not a person authorized to make the recognition; but the members of the State senate of Delaware did make the recognition time after time, call after call of the roll, never retracted it, never questioned it, never doubted it. If any fact was ever shown by human evidence it is the fact that Mr. William T. Watson was recognized by the State senate of Delaware and its members, as a member of that body, and as the presiding officer of the senate.

After these senators had all voted and after the representatives had all voted there was another act of Mr. Watson. I read from the journal:

> Thereupon the speaker of the senate declared that no person having received a majority of all the votes cast for a United States Senator there was no election to said office.
> The joint assembly then proceeded to a second ballot which resulted as follows.

There was a declaration of the speaker of the senate. He was the organ of the senate. He was the president of the joint assembly. It was a declaration of the joint assembly. It was a judgment and declaration of both the house and the senate of Delaware that there had been no election to the office of United States Senator, that the number of members of both houses was 30, and that 15 was not a majority, and it was attested in the most formal, actual manner by the fact that they proceeded to another ballot.

The supporters of Mr. Du Pont now claim that the declaration was false. The answer to that is that the record imports absolute verity. The majority of this committee may say it is false, and any tribunal in the world may pronounce that it is false, but there is no declaration of any tribunal that can set aside the validity and truth of the journal of the State senate of Delaware. They were the judges to make the record. They have made it. They have closed it. They have approved it. Thus it is written, there was no election to the office of Senator of the United States.

Yet the claim is made now in the face of the journal, in the face of the record, in denial of the record, in denial of the record made by the friends of this claimant—for 15 of them were in the joint assembly—in the face of their own declaration, the claim is made now that the record was false, and that there was an election. On which ballot? Twenty-eight were taken. If there was any election at all it must have been on the first ballot. There was only one vacancy to be filled in this body—the vacancy occasioned by the expiry of the term of the Hon. Anthony Higgins, whom most of us recollect as a valued and respected compeer in our labors here. There was but one United States Senator to be elected. On the first ballot the claimant received 15 votes. He received no more on any other ballot. He was elected on that first ballot if he was elected at all. The legislature could not elect again. They could not hold another ballot. If there had been an election the duty and the labor of the legislature was functus officio when the election occurred. There could be no other and further election any more than you could kill a man to-day who died yesterday of cholera. The function was gone. It was vacant. It ceased.

Why did not the friends of this claimant retire? Why did they remain? They composed one-half of the joint assembly. They could have adjourned. They could have returned to their respective chambers, this number alone, and so could have dissolved the joint convention. Why did not they take that action? Because they knew that what they then declared was the truth, and that the record is true. There had been no election. Because they knew what they now claim is false. That is the reason why they remained, to see if there could not be some choice made, as none had been made.

I know it is said that after all this was over there was a protest filed signed by these fifteen persons who voted for Mr. Du Pont. What effect has that upon the act of the joint assembly or of any of its members? What is the meaning of a protest made in this manner? The protest is a privilege of any member of a legislative assembly. He may go and enter his protest. Why? Because there has been invalid action or no action? Not at all. Because there has been binding action which he objects to, and it is to prevent this binding action from being considered as a unanimous precedent that the protest is authorized to be spread on the record. But it has no effect upon the former action of the body. Why was not an objection or protest entered during the balloting? And if it had been entered, what would have been the effect of that? After the first ballot, after Senator Watson had answered to his name and voted, after his vote had been cast, after it had been counted, after it had been declared, why was not a protest made on the second ballot against his right to vote, against his right to be there; that he was not a senator; that he was not a speaker of the senate? And if it had been, what would have been the effect? No effect at all; simply as a protest. A protest is a mere objection. Unless the objection be prosecuted to an appeal overruling the speaker's action, it amounts to nothing. The objection might have been made. The record does not show that there was any objection during the balloting, but if it had been made and the speaker of the house had overruled it upon appeal, the house might have affirmed or disaffirmed the ruling. If they had disaffirmed the ruling, the objection would have been effective; if they had affirmed it, that would have been the end of the protest and the objection. But with respect to the protest being made, simply made, it has no effect whatever upon the action of a parliamentary body.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know if it is stated in the record that there was any action taken on the protest?

Mr. TURPIE. No action at all. It was simply filed.

Mr. FAULKNER. It was not on the record either?

Mr. TURPIE. I am of opinion that it was.

Mr. FAULKNER. It was by affidavit?

Mr. TURPIE. It may not be on the record.

Mr. GEORGE. It is in the affidavit only.

Mr. TURPIE. They voted the second time with the same result—15 votes for Mr. Du Pont and 15 votes for other candidates for United States Senator. The same announcement was made by the chair. I have it here in the journal, at the end of the second ballot:

> Thereupon the speaker of the senate declared that no person having received a majority of all the votes cast for United States Senator there was no election to said office.
> The joint meeting then proceeded to a third ballot, which resulted as follows.

The announcement of the chair is the order and ruling of the house, unless it be objected to and overruled; mere objection does not affect it. Was there any objection? Was there any overruling? The announcement by the chair was affirmed; it was acquiesced in; it is the order of the joint assembly; it is the order of the house of representatives of the State of Delaware; it is the order of the senate of the State of Delaware, upon the face of the record that there was no election to the office of United States Senator on the second ballot; and it shows on the face of the record again that the legislature in joint convention consisted of 30 members, and that 15 was not a majority.

Why, then, did not the joint assembly adjourn? What became of the friends and supporters of this claimant? Sir, it was hope that detained them in their seats; hope, with the knowledge of one thing declared by them. They knew that there had been no election; they hoped that there might be one. They recorded the fact that there had been no election; they hoped that they might record the fact that there had been an election if the general assembly took another and a third ballot. They hoped that the missing vote, giving him sixteen, a majority of the members elected; they hoped that the decisive unit, they hoped that the one voice lacking, the one thing needful, would come, perchance upon the third ballot, peradventure upon the tenth, perhaps upon the twentieth, and so they proceeded to the number of ballots of which I have spoken. They had reason to hope, they had every reason to hope, every hope, to stay, to remain, to hold another ballot.

The honorable and learned Senator from the State of Oregon says that Mr. William T. Watson went in there for the purpose of defeating the election of a United States Senator. For what purpose did the friends of Mr. Addicks go there? He was a political friend; they were political friends of this claimant, Mr. Du Pont. They cast four votes upon every ballot. For what purpose did they go there? Was it to prevent the election of a United States Senator? I do not impeach their motives; I make no statement; I ask for what purpose they went there. I say the four senators who voted for Mr. Addicks had a right to go there and to cast their ballots and give their vote, but they had no greater right; they had the same right that William T. Watson did, as a senator from the county of Kent. What the purpose was, what the intention was, what the motives of the legislature were, or any member of the legislature, the United States Senate does not inquire.

But the sixteenth vote never came. Many of us have passed through that ordeal. There is many a Senatorial aspirant to a seat in this body who has waited like the friends of this claimant, who has hoped like the friends of this claimant, but to whom the one vote needful never arrived. There are many such distinguished men in all the States of the country, but this is the first aspirant who ever came here missing and lacking the one necessary vote, who bases the right and claim to his seat here upon the fact that he never got it. There is no precedent for that action. Many members of this body have been elected by one vote. Edward A. Hannegan, of Indiana, one of the most accomplished orators and statesmen of the United States, who served here with the most remarkable distinction in his time, in his day, in his generation, who was a champion and a friend of the republic of Texas, who voted for the joint resolution annexing that Republic to the Republic of the United States, which resolution was passed in this body by one vote—Mr. Hannegan himself was elected by one vote. I was elected on one occasion to this same body by one vote. It was a vote much reviled; it was a vote greatly denied; it was a vote universally disparaged by political opponents; but the Senate of the United States declared and decided that I had the one vote more than my competitor, Mr. Benjamin Harrison, and therefore I had the seat, the right and title, and occupied it here.

I have referred formerly to the case of Mr. Bateman, of New Jersey. It was in 1826. There Mr. Theodore Frelinghuysen, afterwards a candidate for Vice-President of the United States, was a candidate for the Senate and got 28 votes. Mr. Bateman, who was a member of the senate and speaker of the senate of the State of New Jersey at that time, got upon the last ballot 29 votes, and got those votes by voting for himself. That case came here and he took his seat and served his term.

There are not many more, but there are several other cases of the kind which I have not noted, where a person has been elected a Senator of the United States by a majority of 1 vote, but this claimant if he be seated will have the unique distinction of having been elected a Senator of the United States by a less majority than 1 vote, without any majority; and if the 15 votes cast for other candidates, scattering votes, as they are called, had been massed upon some other gentlemen so that that candidate should have had 15, Mr. Du Pont would have had the 15 he received and there would have been three Senators here chosen under his claim from the State of Delaware instead of two.

It is said sometimes, sir, that circumstances make men. I will not discuss that proposition, but this is a certainty, majorities make United States Senators. No United States Senator has ever been seated on a tie vote.

One of the most interesting state papers in the Senatorial annals is what is called the Table of Senators. It contains the name of every person who has ever been a member of this body and served therein, whether by appointment or election, and one of the most interesting incidents in this table of United States Senators is that of plural elections. It will be found upon examination that a large number of Senators have been elected twice to this body, a lesser number three times, and a still smaller number four times. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, occupied a position of proud preeminence from having been elected, as the record shows, six times successively to the United States Senate. Princeps paternus senatus—the father of the Senate; and grandly he bore and wore that title. But what will become of the claim of Benton or of any other claim to that epithet, so dear to us in the form of the venerable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], when this claimant is seated? There shall have been a Senator of the United States elected twenty-eight times in succession to this body! Father of the Senate! He will be the great great great grandfather of the Senate for all the ages yet to be.

I wish now, sir, to refer to a part of the opinion already quoted in the case of Sanders and Power in speaking of the adjudication upon a contested seat:

> This adjudication is only operative for the future and has no retroactive effect whatever.

That is the law as laid down by the decision of the Senate. What follows upon it? Supposing we should go to work, supposing we should assume jurisdiction, supposing we should usurp the power to declare that William T. Watson, who acted and voted as a senator from the State of Delaware, was not entitled at the time to act and vote as such senator, what would be the effect upon his act and vote which has actually taken place? None whatever.

If the senate of the State of Delaware were to-day in session, if all these objections, constitutional and others, which are urged to his right and title as a senator, the right and title of Mr. Watson to act as a senator, were formally made to the senate of the State of Delaware, and it should to-day enter a formal judgment that he was not a senator, that his seat was vacant, it would not have any effect upon the act and vote of this senator, this member of the Delaware senate on the 9th of May last, if the adjudication is not retroactive. The act of a de facto member of the legislature is just as valid as if there had been a formal adjudication in his favor, and if the action to-day of the State senate of Delaware declaring his seat vacant or suspended or in abeyance for any or all of the reasons here urged against his title would not affect his vote of last May, how is it possible that the action of the Senate of the United States would affect that vote?

This fundamental principle, the qualifications clause in the State constitutions, and in the constitution of the State of Delaware, the decision of the United States Senate upon it, that it would not inquire in any case into the election or qualifications of an individual member of the senate or of the house, I have called the common law of the Senate of the United States. It is the common law of the Senate. It was affirmed after great and full discussion by the most eminent authorities twenty-three years ago, but that very decision says that from the foundation of the Government such claim was without precedent. Up to that time it had been the law. Then it was declared to be the law. It is the law to-day. It is the common law of this court, the general law of jurisdiction upon that subject, that we will make no question respecting the title of an individual member of either house of the legislature who was present and acted and voted as such.

Now, sir, that great common law is founded not only upon the qualifications clause but it is founded upon another clause of the Constitution of the United States. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the manner in which it is supported by that section of the Constitution of the United States. I am very well aware that, speaking hurriedly, almost unconsciously I have applied the wrong word to the exercise of this power. I have said in many instances no doubt during this debate that each house of the State legislature had the exclusive right to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members. That is a partial, an entirely partial, and too careless statement of that clause and of the effect of the qualifications clause. Here is the true word. It occurs in the opinion I have already read. After quoting the clause where the constitution declares that "each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," the court says:

> This is a grant of power—
> Not a right; it is a grant of power—> and constitutes each house the ultimate tribunal as to the qualifications of its own members. * * * And this power is not exhausted when once it has been exercised and a member admitted to his seat. It is a continuous power and runs through the entire term. At any time, and at all times during the term of office, each house is empowered to pass upon the present qualifications of its own members.

In four clauses the learned judge uses the word "power," "absolute power," "ultimate power." It is the correct word. "Exclusive right" is a strong expression, but an exclusive right may be denied and questioned by a power superior. When you say exclusive power, that is sovereign. Sovereign acknowledges no superior. To contend that there was a power superior to exclusive and sovereign power is to deny the hypothesis itself. There can be no conceivable condition in which there can be a power sovereign to an exclusive power. It is power then which the legislature exercises, properly speaking, and not right.

I wish, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to that clause of the Federal Constitution where this power is given:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

It is upon that clause that the power of the qualification clauses of the several constitutions rest. It is a power. Has this power ever been delegated to the United States, to the Senate of the United States, to the House of Representatives of the United States, or to any courts of the United States, or to any department of the Government of the United States—this power of a State legislature to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members? It has not. There is no such delegation. Is it then prohibited to the States by any clause in the Federal Constitution? It is denied or forbidden this power to determine the qualifications of its own members by a State legislature, this exclusive power, this sovereign power—is it prohibited, forbidden, or denied to the States by any clause in the Federal Constitution? It is not, sir. If it then be neither delegated to the United States nor prohibited to the States, where does the power vest, where does it abide, and where does it remain? It is reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. It is one of the reserved powers of the greatest importance, not forbidden to the States, not delegated to any department of the Government of the United States, one of the sovereign and exclusive powers reserved to the States, that their legislatures should be the judges of the qualifications, returns, and elections of their own members, This is the broad, vast foundation for this common law of the Senate, of which I have spoken.

Will the Senate of the United States observe this reservation? Each of us took an oath at that bar not to obey the Constitution, but to support the Constitution of the United States. Support is more than obedience. It is to maintain, it is to uphold, it is to vindicate, it is to defend against all assaults and every assailant. Why, then, shall we transform ourselves into trespassers against this great, reserved, exclusive sovereign power of the State of Delaware? Shall we trespass upon it? Shall we violate this reserved power only this once for any purpose, upon any pretence? I trust not. Without trespassing upon it, without trespassing upon this great reservation of their rights and powers to the States and to the people, we can not arrive at any jurisdiction over the questions raised here in the case at bar.

So long as the Senate of the United States adheres to its well-known common law, so long as we as a court obey that law and support it, we walk in light, we walk in peace upon a public highway, well known, well marked, well defined. When we leave that law, when we invade these reserved rights, we wander forth into the desert, a land unsown, a wilderness full of doubt, full of perplexities, which no patience can unravel, which no wisdom can explore.

Mr. PRITCHARD obtained the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator from North Carolina will yield to me I will submit a motion.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I prefer not to proceed to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 12, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 11, 1896.

POSTMASTERS.

Charles D. Deshler, to be postmaster at New Brunswick, in the county of Middlesex and State of New Jersey.

E. A. Gwaltney, to be postmaster at Bowie, in the county of Montague and State of Texas.

Fred E. Squires, to be postmaster at Henrietta, in the county of Clay and State of Texas.

John H. Fryer, to be postmaster at Whitewater, in the county of Walworth and State of Wisconsin.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE EMPLOYEES.

Several members addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The matter before the House is the report of the Committee on Accounts, submitted yesterday, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the report as printed in full in the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who yesterday asked that this report go over until this morning, seems not to be in the House. I take it for granted that he has read the report as it appears in the RECORD, and that if he had any objection to make to it he would be here for that purpose. I therefore move the adoption of the report and the accompanying resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Georgia stated yesterday that he did not know of any objection to the report; he simply wanted an opportunity to look at it in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. So I understood.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As he is not here to make objection, I suppose there is none.

The question being taken, the report was adopted.

On motion of Mr. ALDRICH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CANNON. By the direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I report a bill to provide for printing and binding for the Navy Department; and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration now in the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896.

The bill was read the first and second time; and there being no objection, the House proceeded to its consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. A single word for the information of the House. When the Committee on Appropriations prepared the urgent deficiency bill, we caused notice to be given to all the Departments to send forward all urgent items, and we waited ten days for them to do so. Then the bill passed and went to the Senate. Two or three weeks elapsed before it was enacted into law. This is an item that did not come to us in response to that request. The committee, having fully investigated the matter, finds that this additional appropriation is required for the printing and binding in the Navy Department. I ask consent that the final letter from the Secretary of the Navy on this subject may be inserted in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 10, 1896.

SIR: In my letter to you of the 29th ultimo, I pointed out the reason for submitting a deficiency estimate of $25,000 for printing and binding for the Navy Department, and asked that in case an urgent deficiency bill was submitted before the general deficiency bill was taken up that your committee would include this item, and if not that it be included in the general deficiency bill.

I dislike to ask for a special urgent deficiency bill for this item, and was in hopes that the branch printing office and bindery for this Department could be kept running until the general deficiency bill passed, which would enable the Department to do such work as was absolutely imperative, but the Public Printer reports that he will have to close this branch office on Thursday of this week, which will very much embarrass the Department.

If no printing can be done until the general deficiency bill passes, considerable confusion, delay, and increased work in the transaction of the business of the Department will result. Forms which are now in use, including those for new vessels under construction, would have to be written out by hand; the preparation of specifications for new ships would be delayed, and some of the records of the Department could not be bound in shape for ready reference. Books and blanks supplied to the navy-yards, and for which there are constant calls, could not be furnished.

As considerable printing has been held back for some time, there are a number of blank forms which are almost exhausted. Among these are the conduct books and muster-roll blanks for the use of vessels in commission, upon which the records of officers and men are kept and reported to the Department. The information furnished on these forms regarding enlisted men is required to be kept by statute and Navy Regulations.

The Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, which is the Bureau charged with the maintenance of the property and money accounts of the Department, reports that for the various reports, returns, and accounts, etc., the Bureau provides 189 different kinds of books and blank forms, and books for the use of officers in addition to the books and forms used only in the Bureau; that supplies of these have been procured from the Public Printer from time to time as required to meet the demands for a limited period, and if not replenished a large number will become exhausted before the close of the fiscal year. Some 30 of these forms, some of them books, are now practically exhausted, and an additional supply of 15 others will be exhausted in a very short time. It is necessary that certain annual books of accounts and record, both for bureau and navy-yard use, should be prepared and distributed before the beginning of each fiscal year, and that blank proposals and schedules of supplies being constantly purchased after advertisement should be printed.

The Hydrographic Office prepares ocean and lake surveys, charts, maps, and sailing directions for general navigation in the coast trade and on the lakes. Weekly bulletins containing information for the guidance of mariners are printed and sent out from the Department and the branch hydrographic offices. This work, which is exceedingly important, will also have to stop unless money can be made immediately available to do the printing for this Department.

In view of these facts I feel constrained to ask that you report the deficiency estimate of $25,000 referred to in an urgent deficiency bill.

Very respectfully,

H. A. HERBERT, Secretary.

Hon. J. G. CANNON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What amount of appropriation is provided for in the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Twenty-five thousand dollars for the remainder of the year. If there is no gentleman who desires information about this matter, I ask that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 862) for the relief of the receivers of the Towboat Association of New Orleans, La.—to the Committee on War Claims; and

A bill (S. 1871) to provide for the punishment of offenses on the high seas—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

PURCHASE OF BLANKS FOR PENNIES AND NICKELS.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas section 3709 of the Revised Statutes provides that "all purchases and contracts for supplies * * * shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same": Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to furnish the House of Representatives, at the earliest date practicable, with a detailed statement of the price per pound and quantity of blanks for nickels and pennies supplied to and purchased by the superintendent of the mint in Philadelphia, Pa., since April, 1890, and whether, since that time, section 3709 of the Revised Statutes has been complied with in every particular.

Resolved, That he is hereby authorized and directed to furnish a detailed comparison of the contract price of said blanks with the market quotations for similar material during the entire period.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to whom was referred House resolution No. 172, requesting certain information from the Secretary of the Treasury, respectfully report:

That the law authorizing and regulating the purchase of metal for the coinage of the minor coins is embraced in section 5528 of the Revised Statutes, which specifically invests in the superintendent of the mint at Philadelphia the power to make such purchases, as follows: "The superintendent, with the approval of the Director of the Mint as to price, terms, and quantity, shall purchase the metal required for such coining by public advertisement, and the lowest and best bids shall be accepted; the fineness of the metal to be determined on the mint assay." Hence the preamble of the resolution submitted is entirely inapplicable, and the recital in the first resolution of the section of the Revised Statutes is inaccurate.

Your committee therefore recommend that the resolution be amended by striking out the preamble, and by further striking out the words "thirty-seven hundred and nine" in the eighth line of the first resolution and inserting in lieu thereof "thirty-seven hundred and fifty-eight," and as thus amended they recommend the passage of the resolution.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CHARLES W. STONE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GEORGE H. LOTT.

Mr. DENNY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5229) for the relief of George H. Lott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George H. Lott, a citizen of Mississippi, the sum of $148, that being the amount deducted by the Post-Office Department from the pay of said George H. Lott, as subcontractor on mail route No. 26530, in the State aforesaid, because the mail service thereon was performed by the minor son of the postmaster at Stix, Miss.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the report in that case be read, reserving the right to object.

The report (by Mr. DENNY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5229) for the relief of George H. Lott, of Mississippi, have carefully considered the same and report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The facts in this case are briefly as follows:

The contract for mail service on route No. 26530, in the State of Mississippi, was let to one W. B. Catchings, of Kentucky, for the price and sum of $220 per annum, and he in turn sublet the contract to one E. Brocket, for the sum of $180 per annum. Brocket failed to perform the service as per contract and the postmaster at Stix, Miss., thereupon engaged Mr. Brocket by the month to perform this service, which he did for six months and then quit. Said postmaster, acting under authority, then offered the contract to bidders, and requested G. H. Lott to bid for the contract and give the bond. This Lott consented to do, doubtless with the commendable desire of securing efficiency in the service rather than the pecuniary profit to be derived therefrom. Lott, being only a farmer, having no other mail contract, and not familiar with the postal laws and regulations, employed to do this service the son of the postmaster at Stix, which was in violation of the postal regulations.

This fact coming to the knowledge of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he, as required by law or postal regulation, withheld the salary of Mr. Lott, amounting to $148. A petition for revocation of the order withholding said sum and its payment to Mr. Lott was filed in the Post-Office Department, but refused because of no authority in law for such action.

It appears from the petition on file, a copy of which is in the hands of the committee, the affidavit of G. H. Lott, and letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that the service was faithfully performed, the mails always promptly delivered, and the law in all respects complied with except in the matter of the employment of the postmaster's son as carrier of said mail. Said route extends between Stix (now Hecla) and Hattiesburg, Miss., a distance of 6½ miles, and the mails are delivered daily except Sundays.

Mr. LOUD. What has the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said in the letter to which reference has been made that he transmitted outside of what is contained in this report?

This presents a very peculiar condition, but one that is continually existing, where postmasters themselves desire to secure the mail contract, and they adopt these out-of-order and unusual means to secure it.

Mr. DENNY. I will send to the desk to be read the letters from the Post-Office Department on this subject.

The letters were read, as follows:

OFFICE OF SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1895.

SIR: Referring to a petition of citizens of Hattiesburg, Miss., addressed to you and referred by you to this office, requesting a remission of the deduction from the pay of Mr. G. H. Lott, subcontractor on route No. 26530, on account of mail service having been performed by a minor son of the postmaster at Stix, Miss., I have the honor to state that the postal laws and regulations prohibit payment for mail service performed by a member of the postmaster's immediate family.

The deduction was made under this authority, and therefore this office is obliged to decline to order the remission as requested by your petitioners.

Very respectfully,

C. NIELSON,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. WALTER M. DENNY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

OFFICE OF SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1896.

DEAR SIR: Referring to House bill 5229, for the relief of George H. Lott, I beg to state that we find that the service has been performed by these people to the entire satisfaction and for the benefit of the Government, and that the only thing that stands in the way of this man being justly paid is the existence of the law mentioned in my letter of January 11, 1895, and I would therefore recommend that the bill be approved of by the Department.

Yours, truly,

C. NIELSON,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. WILLIAM L. WILSON,
Postmaster-General.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DENNY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FREE BRIDGE ACROSS THE ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6505) to revive and reenact an act to authorize the construction of a free bridge across the Arkansas River, connecting Little Rock and Argenta.

Mr. DANIELS. I must ask the regular order. I desire to call up the contested-election case of Aldrich against Robbins.

Mr. TERRY. I trust the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment. This is a little bridge bill reported from the committee and does not carry a dollar of money.

Mr. DANIELS. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved February 28, 1893, entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a free bridge across the Arkansas River, connecting Little Rock and Argenta," which act has expired by limitation, be, and is hereby, revived and reenacted.

SEC. 2. That section 7 of the said act be amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year from February 28, 1896, and completed within three years from that date."

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS ILLINOIS AND MISSISSIPPI CANAL.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5979) for the right of the Rock Island, Muscatine and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Illinois and Mississippi Canal.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Rock Island, Muscatine and Southwestern Railway Company, organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, is hereby authorized to build a drawbridge for wagon and railroad purposes across the Illinois and Mississippi Canal in sections numbered 9 or 10, township 17, range 2, west of the fourth principal meridian, situate in the county of Rock Island and State of Illinois, and about 2,200 feet in an easterly direction from Lock No. 37. Said bridge to be built according to the requirements of the War Department.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce recommended certain amendments, set forth in the following report, which was read by the Clerk:

The bill provides for the construction of a bridge, as provided in the title of the bill. The matter has been referred to the War Department, and under date of February 29, 1896, General Craighill reports thereon, suggesting certain amendments to the bill, and states that as thus amended there is no objection to the passage of the bill. The committee recommend the adoption of the amendments, and as amended recommend the passage of the bill. The amendments are:

Add at the end of the bill:

"Provided, That the said drawbridge shall span the entire canal, or at least span with one drawspan the 60-foot bottom width of the canal, and shall be built with suitable girders and retaining walls, similar to what have been built by the United States at the bridges at Milan, Ill., and with the axis of the bridge perpendicular to the axis of the canal: Provided also, That the lowest member of the bridge shall be above the grade of the north embankment, and suitable provision be made for the towpath and highway crossings along the crossing of the south embankment of the canal and the railroad tracks and embankment: And provided further, That the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats; and the owners of the bridge shall maintain, at their own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board may prescribe.

"SEC. 2. That no bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the navigation of said canal; and no bridge shall be commenced or built under this act until the location thereof and the plans and specifications for its construction shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War; and any change in the plan of such construction or any alteration in the bridge after its construction shall be subject to the like approval; and whenever said bridge shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, substantially obstruct the free navigation of said canal, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstructions; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge, or the persons operating or controlling the same.

"SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

"SEC. 4. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the approval of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PRINCE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. MAHONEY.

Mr. BARHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 900) to provide for the payment of the claim of William H. Mahoney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to receive and redeem, without the indorsement of N. A. Rogers, and to pay to W. H. Mahoney, the present owner thereof, out of the moneys appropriated for the redemption of bonds issued by the Treasury Department of the United States pursuant to an act of Congress approved March 2, 1861, to provide for expenses incurred by the Territories in the suppression of Indian hostilities therein in the years 1855 and 1856, the sum of $500, upon the delivery by said W. H. Mahoney to the said Secretary of that certain bond designated as "Oregon war debt bond, No. 1358," issued on March 24, 1862, by the Treasury Department pursuant to said act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest that we ought to have the report read.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is all right. The usual provision is contained in the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well.

The Committee on Claims recommended the following amendment:

Add after the word "act," in line 18, page 2, the following words: "and upon the said W. H. Mahoney giving a good and sufficient bond in the penal sum of $1,000 to hold harmless the United States against repayment of said lost bond, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER AT KNOXVILLE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6304) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at Knoxville, Tenn.

The bill was read.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce recommended that the bill be amended so as to read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Knox, in the State of Tennessee, in its corporate capacity, and either alone or in conjunction with the city of Knoxville, Tenn., as said county may elect, is hereby authorized and empowered to construct and maintain a bridge over and across the Tennessee River, at or near the site and in lieu of the present bridge over the said river, at the city of Knoxville, so as to connect said city of Knoxville with the opposite or south bank of said river.

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be so constructed that a reasonably free and unobstructed passageway may be secured to all water craft navigating said river at the point aforesaid; and if said bridge shall be constructed as a drawbridge the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats and vessels; and whatever kind of bridge is constructed the owners thereof shall maintain, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or signals thereon as the Light-House Board shall prescribe: Provided, That if said bridge be constructed to accommodate street-railway traffic, all street-car and electric-car companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of cars over the same and over the approaches thereto, upon the payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case of disagreement between the owners of the bridge and the several electric and street car companies, or any of them, desiring such use in regard to the sum or sums to be paid, or the rules and conditions to be conformed to, all matters at issue shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon the hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 3. That said bridge shall not be built or commenced until the plans and location of the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of War, and no change shall be made in its construction, and no alteration of it shall be made after its construction, unless such change or alteration shall in like manner receive the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War, upon receiving the design, drawings, and specifications of said bridge, and a map of the location, and such other information as he may call for, and upon being satisfied that the bridge when built according to such design and drawings will be in accordance with the requirements of this act, and will not unreasonably obstruct the navigation of said river, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to approve said design, drawings, and specifications, and to so notify said county of Knox; and upon receiving such notification the said county of Knox may proceed to construct said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved design, drawings, and specifications.

SEC. 5. That any bridge built under this act, and according to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States shall be transmitted free of charge.

SEC. 6. That the right is hereby expressly reserved to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TERMS OF UNITED STATES COURTS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2290) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the State of South Dakota.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of South Dakota shall constitute one judicial district.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of holding terms of the district court said district shall be divided into five divisions, to be known as the southern, eastern, northern, central, and western divisions. The counties of Clay, Union, Yankton, Turner, Hutchinson, Bonhomme, Charles Mix, Douglas, Gregory, Todd, and the Yankton Indian Reservation shall constitute the southern division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Yankton. The counties of Brule, Aurora, Davison, Hanson, McCook, Minnehaha, Moody, Lake, Sanborn, Lyman, Miner, Beadle, and Kingsbury, and the Crow Creek and Lower Brule Indian reservations shall constitute the eastern division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Sioux Falls. The counties of Brookings, Hamlin, Deuel, Grant, Roberts, Codington, Clark, Day, Marshall, Spink, Brown, McPherson, Edmunds, Campbell, Walworth, and the Sisseton and Wahpeton Reservation shall constitute the northern division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Aberdeen. The counties of Potter, Sully, Faulk, Hand, Hyde, Hughes, Buffalo, Jerauld, Stanley, Nowlin, and that portion of the counties of Pratt, Jackson, and Sterling not included in any Indian reservation, and the Standing Rock and Cheyenne Indian reservations shall constitute the central division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Pierre. All that portion of the State of South Dakota lying west of the northern, central, eastern, and southern divisions, and in addition thereto the Rosebud and Red Cloud Indian reservations, shall constitute the western division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Deadwood.

SEC. 3. That hereafter the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in and for the State of South Dakota shall be as follows: At Yankton, on the fourth Tuesday in May and the second Tuesday in December; at Sioux Falls, on the first Tuesday in April and the third Tuesday in October; at Pierre, on the first Tuesday in March and October; at Deadwood, on the first Tuesday in February and September, and at Aberdeen, on the first Tuesday in May and the third Tuesday in November.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of statute now existing for the holding of said courts on any day contrary to the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, and all suits, prosecutions, process, recognizances, bail bonds, and other things pending in or returnable to said court on the days now fixed by law are hereby transferred to and shall be made returnable to and have force in the said respective terms in this act provided in the same manner and with the same effect as they would have had had said existing statute not have been passed.

SEC. 5. That all civil suits not of a local nature must be brought in the division of the district where the defendant or defendants reside; but if there are two or more defendants residing in different divisions, the action may be brought in either of the divisions in which a defendant resides.

SEC. 6. That cases taken on appeal or writ of error from the district court shall be returnable to the circuit court held in that judicial subdivision from which the appeal was taken. When the circuit court and district court are held, as provided in this act, at the same time and place, one grand and petit jury only shall be summoned and serve in both said courts, and all grand and petit juries for the circuit and district courts shall be drawn by the clerk of the circuit court and all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be residents of such division.

SEC. 7. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAMBLE. I move that the amendments reported by the committee be concurred in.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, was read:

In lines 1 and 2 of section 2 insert the words "circuit and" before the word "district"; also in line 2 strike out the word "court" and insert the word "courts."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOHN RUHM, SR.

Mr. MCCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1882) for the relief of John Ruhm, sr., of Nashville, Tenn.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. ADAMS. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from California having in charge the Post-Office appropriation bill, with the understanding that he will be able to finish it in two hours, and then that this contested-election case will be taken up immediately upon the conclusion of that bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6614. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 14, page 4, after the word "dollars," the following: "And the Postmaster-General, in his discretion, may use not exceeding the sum of $35,000 of this amount in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices."

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it is hardly necessary that I should say anything further in regard to this amendment than was said yesterday. It is offered upon the recommendation of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who says as a result of the experiment in the transmission of mail in large cities by pneumatic tubes a very considerable saving will be effected in the cost of the mail-messenger service; and the experiments have now reached a point where it will be possible by the expenditure of the $35,000 asked for to complete this service and save the Government a very considerable sum of money.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROMWELL. I have another amendment which is now necessary, which I would like to offer, to strike out all the words of the twentieth paragraph, commencing with the word "and" following the word "dollars," and including the rest of that paragraph.

Mr. PICKLER. That is out now.

The CHAIRMAN. That went out on a point of order.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is all right, then.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the next item I would like to ask unanimous consent for three or four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from California will proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. I think I owe this, Mr. Chairman, in justice to the committee over which I have the honor to preside, and I will briefly call the attention of the gentleman from South Dakota to page 2657 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, down on the first column, in which the gentleman said, among other things:

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, says that this is positively against his judgment, and, as I understand, it is against the judgment of other members of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. What right has the gentleman to understand that?

Mr. PICKLER. I understand that the chairman of the committee arbitrarily cut down this item, as he did others, in the face of the opposition of members of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not. Some of your committee——

There he was evidently cut off by the confusion.

Mr. LOUD. Whoever gives you that information informs you of that which is false.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, that is what I understand. I understand that not only on this item, but on others, the gentleman arbitrarily bore his committee down.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while of course the members of this House do not ordinarily pay much attention to what the gentleman from South Dakota says [laughter], we are confronted with this condition—that the people of this country do not understand Brother PICKLER, and they may possibly misinterpret the true meaning of this.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of that committee, that it is composed of 17 men of equal—and I will say of superior—intelligence to the gentleman from South Dakota; that they are honest, fearless, sincere, and have integrity; and if any member of this House assumes that I could arbitrarily force those 17 gentlemen to accept my views it is a slander upon that committee which I, as its chairman, can not fail to resent. Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say, so far as this appropriation bill is concerned, that for more than six weeks the subcommittee of which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] are the two members with myself daily considered every item in this bill; and while perhaps every item does not agree with my views, or the views of the gentleman from Mississippi, or those of the gentleman from Illinois, it was, on the whole, the result of our best judgment and our hard labor. That bill was submitted to the whole committee, permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, and for more than two whole days the bill was carefully considered by that committee; and this bill is the result of their labor. I do not assume to say that some individual member of the committee may not have objected to some of the items; but I do say this, Mr. Chairman, that my experience on the Post-Office Committee has been that never since I have been a member of it has the Post-Office appropriation bill been considered by the whole committee for a period of more than one hour. This is a slander I desire to resent, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of that committee; and I hope that the gentleman now, after having had a night's rest upon this proposition, will get up before this House and retract the base slander that he desires to put upon 17 of its members.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I not only reiterate what I said yesterday, but I affirm it again. [Laughter.] This is no fight of mine. This is a difference in opinion between different members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I may say that it was not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], either, who informed me of the arbitrary action of the chairman, and I may say further that a member of that committee told me that he hoped this bill might be recommitted because of the action of the chairman before the bill was reported. It is a matter of general notoriety in the House that this appropriation bill is very distasteful now to different members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The gentleman from California does not need to go outside of his own neighborhood to ascertain that. The fact is well known here, and has been well known ever since this bill was reported, and is well known now, and I have not begun to tell the gentleman what I have heard in regard to it, and from members of his own committee, too. Now, I do not know who is right. I do not undertake to say who is right; but that difference exists between the members of the Post-Office Committee, and it is not for me to settle it. I do not care what the gentleman from California says about his opinion of my criticising him. I only say this, Mr. Chairman, that from the arbitrary way in which he cuts off members here in the House, from his universally arbitrary practice in denying to members on this floor a decent consideration of matters in which they are interested, and in which their constituents are very much interested, I would judge that the members of his committee who have talked with me about his action in the committee are right, and that his memory as to what occurred there is at fault this morning. I have nothing to retract. I have only stated what members of that committee have told me, and I would just as willingly believe that they recollect correctly what occurred in the committee room as that the gentleman from California does.

The Clerk read as follows:

Forty-first. Mail depredations and post-office inspectors: For pay of post-office inspectors and clerks, $212,093.66: Provided, That inspectors hereafter appointed shall be paid a salary at the rate of $1,200 for first year, $1,350 for second year, $1,500 for third year, and $1,600 for fourth year and each year thereafter.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the proviso that it changes existing law and is therefore not admissible upon an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SPENCER. It is not necessary that I should be heard, if no explanation is offered of the proviso.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address myself for a moment to the gentleman from Mississippi. Before doing so, however, I would say that it is possible this proviso is subject to the point of order, but I say to the House that the provision as it stands in the bill is the result of our best thought and best labor. We found this condition existing, that a post-office inspector after six months probation might pass into the $1,600 class, and while I might have anticipated a point of order on this proviso from some sources, I hardly expected it from my friend from Mississippi. The gentleman assumes that these inspectors should immediately go into the $1,600 class, and I am free to say that if the proviso is stricken out on the point of order that will be the result, but, in the interest of the service, in the interest of every condition that now exists in the service, I had assumed that this House would recognize that a proviso of this kind was a necessity; that it was not proper to put an inspector immediately into the $1,600 class, because every man who has given thought to the subject knows that an inspector for the first two years of his service is not worth to the Government $500 a year. For that reason the committee thought that these inspectors ought to go up by grades into the $1,600 class the same as in other branches of the service. However, if the gentleman insists on the point of order, so far as I am concerned, I do not see that any answer can be made to it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do I understand that these inspectors will go to the $1,600 class at once, instead of grading up through a series of years?

Mr. LOUD. That will be the effect.

Mr. McMILLIN. The effect of the point of order being sustained, then, will be to increase expenditures rather than to diminish them.

Mr. LOUD. The effect will be to force these men immediately into the $1,600 class.

Mr. SPENCER. That is the law.

Mr. McMILLIN. But this proviso applies to new men to be employed, and the effect of the proviso would be to require them to go up gradually, as has been done heretofore, beginning at a low rate of pay and ascending to the higher grade. As I understand it, the effect of striking out the proviso will be to put these new officers at once on the $1,600 grade, which of course will result in an increase of expenditure.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Chairman, with no view of antagonizing any proposition for economy, but simply for the purpose of demonstrating a condition, I make this point of order, because I hold that we should proceed upon a plan which will insure to us inspectors who, from the first, are worth $1,600 a year, instead of employing men who need to be put on probationary terms for two or three or more years. If the men in this service are capable of earning $1,600 a year, men can be got who can do it from the first. It is not a matter of economy to engage men at $1,200, when you can employ men that are worth from the first $1,600. To engage cheaper men who can not do the work efficiently on that ground is false economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. QUIGG. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 4 and 5, page 11, the words "two hundred and twelve" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and seventy-six"; so as to make the amount of the appropriation $176,093.66.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to reduce the appropriation placed at the disposal of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General in that sum which is intended to perpetuate and legalize what has been properly called here the "spy system."

This Committee of the Whole has been somewhat confused, I think, by statements that have been made here by the gentleman from California, the chairman of the committee, as to the spy system and whether or not it is to be found in this bill. The other day when that gentleman was asked whether this appropriation did or did not carry a sum of money to create spies to dog the letter carriers, there was this inquiry and this answer:

Mr. QUIGG. If I understand the gentleman from California, he has simply prevented the employment of these spies by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, but increases the sum at the service of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General so as to enable the employment of 30 more of them. Is that correct?

Mr. LOUD. Thirty more inspectors. If the gentleman will add that to his question, I will say yes. That is the sum and substance of the result of the provision, simply an increase of the force of post-office inspectors. They may be used for this purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care whether you call these officers inspectors or special agents or spies. Garlic by any other name will smell as bad. What they are intended to do, the work that is expected of them, there can be no doubt about; for the First Assistant Postmaster-General has told us what it is in his report.

I want the committee to understand exactly what this spy system is and how it originated. It came about through special investigations on the part of the First Assistant Postmaster-General into the conduct of various post-offices; and as a result of those preliminary investigations he organized—illegally, as I contend—a force of these spies to go around and dog the letter carriers, follow them, spy upon them, and report their alleged delinquencies. Each of these spies was furnished with a blue card which had on it the name of the letter carrier he was to follow, a definition of his route, a statement of the hours when he was to start and when he was to return to the post-office. With this card in his hand the spy followed the letter carrier.

Now, the presence of these spies in the particular city to which they were sent was unknown even to the postmaster of that city. These cards were provided from the central office here—the Department at Washington. Now, put yourself in the place of a letter carrier and put somebody else in the place of the spy, and see how it works. The chief under whom you are operating, the superintendent of your substation, does not know that a spy is to be on your track with a blue card telling him how you ought to go. Suppose the force is short for one reason or another, and the superintendent changes your route. You go out upon a route partially your own and partially somebody else's. The spy follows, not knowing that your orders have been changed. And let us suppose that he is perfectly honest, perfectly intelligent, and willing to do his duty. He discovers that you have left your route and notices the places where you stop, and where, as he assumes, you were not intended to stop, and you are reported as off your route. We will suppose that your route has been extended so much (and this has happened again and again) that you have no time to go home to luncheon; you stop on a corner to get a sandwich and a glass of beer. You are reported as loitering and drinking in a saloon.

Now, I say that cases of this kind have occurred again and again. At a time from three to six weeks after such an occurrence, when all the reports have come back here to Washington and have been looked over and considered, a complaint is lodged against you. You do not remember the occurrence; it has slipped your mind. You know that you never had complaints against you. You know that you are an honest man and a faithful servant of the Government. You deny the charge; and an issue of veracity is raised at once between you and the spy. He knows nothing about your route. He does not know how long or how short a time you are entitled to remain within a particular building. He does not know how many letters you have to deliver in a vast office building; but he knows that you stay at No. 39 such and such a street for half an hour; he puts his own inferences upon that and draws his own conclusions.

Now, I appeal to gentlemen in this House to say whether this system is not utterly odious. Is there a man here who would introduce it into his own business? Nobody opposes a suitable system of espionage upon carriers or upon anybody in the public service. I suggested to the gentleman from California the other day—and I find that it had been previously recommended by a postmaster-general, Mr. Wanamaker—that a captain be provided for a squad of carriers and that he perform the duties that a roundsman performs in connection with any well-organized force, such as a police force or a fireman's force.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KNOX. I move that the gentleman's time be extended. I think this is an important matter.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to have five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the extension of time as asked.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a civilized country. It ought to have a civilized government. We are a people and a Government who proceed upon the theory of universal good faith, and it has worked pretty well thus far. I object to the degredation of the great Government of the United States to the level of a street-car company. These spies are simply "spotters"—that and nothing else. Let us see what the First Assistant Postmaster-General says about what they are doing—I have already described how they do it:

The agents obtain a record of the conduct of each carrier, the manner in which he performs his duties, take account of the exact time consumed by him on his route, test the efficiency of the collection and the delivery service, report the condition of letter boxes and whether or not they are supplied with proper time cards, and, in short, collect information that can not be gathered in any other way—

I dispute that—

When they are detailed for service in a city, they are supplied with the letter carriers' schedule and route cards, so that they may have no trouble in locating carriers at any point on their respective routes at any time during the schedule—

Why, sir, it is physically an utter impossibility, and everybody knows it—

At the close of each investigation they prepare a general report on the condition and requirements of the service, stating whether an increase of force is necessary or a decrease possible.

Then he goes on to say that a postmaster in a town visited by these spies is not allowed to know of their presence. The Assistant Postmaster-General says that the results of these investigations have been beneficial to the service. He tells of great reductions of the force. He tells us of numerous dismissals for cause. Whose business is it to superintend the carriers? Is it not the business of the postmasters? Has any postmaster been disciplined for neglect of duty as the result of the discoveries of these special agents with regard to the misbehavior of carriers? Nobody has heard of anything of the kind yet.

He talks of great reductions of force, especially in the city of Philadelphia. Does not everybody know that before the 100 carriers were reduced from that force 81 were put on? Now, I do not want to raise a partisan question in this connection, but I think it would be extremely interesting to know what were the party politics of the 81 put on preliminary to this investigation and the politics of the 100 turned off immediately afterwards.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that these special agents have been unlawfully appointed. The gentleman from California calls them "inspectors." He says that this sort of work has always been done. The First Assistant Postmaster-General says that it has not been done and that it was an innovation and invention of his own, and that he takes infinite pride in it. The gentleman from California says that it is an old system in the Department.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption just there?

Mr. QUIGG. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. I stated emphatically—and I presume the gentleman does not want to misinterpret or misquote me——

Mr. QUIGG. Most certainly not.

Mr. LOUD. I said that a system of supervision had always been carried on by the regular inspectors' force of the Department until two years ago, when the First Assistant Postmaster-General had established this system, and then the regular inspectors had been turned from that to other duties.

Mr. QUIGG. The First Assistant Postmaster-General says that he established this spy force in February, 1895.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, the gentleman is talking of something else now. He is "post-morteming" a question that is already dead.

Mr. QUIGG. Already dead? Then what are you to do with these 30 inspectors you want permission to employ?

I ask the gentleman from California to tell this committee frankly whether he does not know that these 30 inspectors are intended to be used as spies on the letter carriers?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to have a few minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. QUIGG. I will with the greatest pleasure. But I have addressed an inquiry to the gentleman from California which I shall be glad to have answered.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman repeat his inquiry?

Mr. QUIGG. I asked the gentleman from California to tell the committee fairly and frankly, as of course he will if he says anything at all on the subject, if he does not know it to be a fact that these 30 additional inspectors sought to be employed by this bill are to be used as spies on the letter carriers? Is not that to be at least one of their functions?

Mr. LOUD. No more than it is now the function of the post-office inspector. Now, I assume, of course, that the gentleman will consider that as equivocating; and that he does not regard it as a candid answer——

Mr. QUIGG. I shall not characterize the gentleman's reply. I think the committee can understand it without any criticism.

Mr. LOUD. I can not assume that the inspectors will do any service that they have not done heretofore.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Then why increase the force?

Mr. LOUD. I have already stated that, and I do not wish now to take the time of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for an inquiry.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York what he means when he uses the word "spy."

Mr. CROWTHER. The legitimate definition of the word.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman from New York will give his definition of the word I will be obliged to him.

Mr. QUIGG. I mean, as I apply the word here, to describe a person who secretly follows at the heels of a carrier upon his route and reports upon the carrier's behavior. I distinguish between a person who performs the function of a sneak and one who performs that of a superintendent. I have designated the latter as a "roundsman." He patrols his beat examining as to the efficiency of the service within that territory.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that the inspectors' force proper of the Post-Office Department has always and at all times exercised this watchfulness and care over and investigated the honesty of the carriers in innumerable ways?

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, wherein comes in the "spy" as distinguished from the inspector when he simply exercises the same watchfulness and care over the carriers employed by the Department?

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman has read the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General. He knows that that official claims he has invented this system of spy inspection. He knows that these spies have been employed in the country generally, and largely in Philadelphia——

Mr. BINGHAM. Largely in Philadelphia?

Mr. QUIGG (continuing). And he knows what they have been doing; and the question is whether Congress wants this Government to be engaged in that sort of business. If so, if it is his opinion that that should be done, if he likes the system, why, let him so vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. But how will you supervise the fidelity and industry of 13,000 men unless you have some force to do it?

Mr. QUIGG. You have that force; we are going to leave it wholly undisturbed—$176,000 worth of force. I leave all that in the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman knows that they are thoroughly engaged now.

Mr. QUIGG. I hope they are. They should be.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will ask the gentleman if he refers to the spies who were sent out to the different cities of the country during the past summer?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes; I am proposing to make an end of them.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Watching and dogging the footsteps of carriers?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And who had the carriers reported and discharged and suspended for drinking beer and soda water and one thing and another?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes, whether they did or not.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In my city they discharged six and suspended four, who were afterwards reinstated. The four reinstated were Democrats, and the six who were not reinstated were, every one of them, Republicans. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Were they the spies or the letter carriers?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The spies were all Democrats, of course. The letter carriers who were turned out through the influence of these spies, although those carriers were protected under the civil-service laws, all turned out to be Republicans, and that is why they were turned out.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Would not the country be better protected if Republican spies were put in to watch the Democratic spies who were watching the letter carriers? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to have five minutes more. I have been interrupted.

By unanimous consent, Mr. QUIGG'S time was extended five minutes.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have been assured that this kind of thing was always done, and that in spite of the statement of the First Assistant Postmaster-General that he invented the system, and that it is his own little pet child——

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman that it has been done since 1890——

Mr. QUIGG. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am giving the gentleman a date and stating to him that it has been done since 1890.

Mr. QUIGG. Here is what the law says about the appointment of post-office inspectors:

All post-office inspectors, except the twelve in charge of divisions, are included in the classified civil service. Post-office inspectors are appointed by the Postmaster-General, subject to the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883, but are not appointed for service in any particular State or locality, and will be expected to perform duty wherever required.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. I have a letter here from a gentleman, who, I am sure, is well posted on this matter, in which appears this paragraph, and I should like to ask the gentleman if he has any information on the subject:

On the 15th of October, 1894, 81 additional carriers were appointed at the Philadelphia office. In less than two months thereafter a force of "special mechanics" (they were not known as secret agents then) were sent to that place to inspect the service (not to mend letter boxes), and upon the basis of their reports 100 letter carriers were reduced to the substitute roll——

Mr. QUIGG. I have already spoken of them.

Mr. PICKLER (reading)—

78 at $1,000 and 22 at $800, thus showing that not a single carrier at $600 was touched. Was this an accident? Can it be possible that carriers in the service less than one year were more competent to serve the people of Philadelphia than those who had been in the service for years, and among them comrades in the war of the rebellion?

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, the appointment of these inspectors has been a disgusting shame and disgrace.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUIGG. I can not. I have only three or four minutes.

Mr. LOUD. I will use my best endeavor to get the gentleman all the time he wants.

Mr. QUIGG. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. LOUD. I want to convince the gentleman of this fact, that he is hardly fair——

Mr. QUIGG. It will be difficult to convince me that I am not fair.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman has read to the House the rule governing the appointment of post-office inspectors. Then he immediately turns to the spy system, which I myself hold and the committee held was contrary to existing law.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman has not given me time to distinguish. I am going to make the distinction.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think you will, fairly.

Mr. QUIGG. Well, surely——

Mr. LOUD. I ask the gentleman this question: Will not these additional men provided in this bill be appointed under this very law?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. And will not they be appointed under that law? Now, answer that question frankly.

Mr. QUIGG. They will be appointed under that law—perhaps.

Mr. LOUD. Then, they seem to be your spies?

Mr. QUIGG. Not a bit of it. The fact is that the law just now read has been violated—you admit that it has been violated—and there is no reason under the heavens why we should assume that the people who violated it in the first instance would not violate it again. That has been the law all along. They had no right to appoint these inspectors and call them mechanics, pretending that they were going around to fix up the letter boxes, when they were really dogging the footsteps of the letter carriers and acting as spies.

Mr. PICKLER. And having them reduced.

Mr. QUIGG. Why, it is contemptible. Can any American gentleman approve of such a business? I think I have said all I care to, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I trust I will not be little enough in my conception of the importance of this question or of the duties of a legislator to make it possible for me to try to degenerate this into a political matter. I think those who are with me will bear testimony to the fact that during my humble service I have at least striven to hold up the hands of every faithful officer of this Government in the discharge of his duties, whether under a Republican or a Democratic Administration, and all the efforts on the part of the distinguished gentleman or of any other member of this House to make this out a partisan attack by the Post-Office Department upon officials of a different political faith to the officers that are engaged in the administration of these offices is wholly unfounded, if not malicious. I will not say it is the latter, but the former I do know it is. There is no partisanship in the conduct of this investigation in the Post-Office Department.

It did not begin under a Democratic administration. It has existed under both Republican administrations and Democratic administrations. Both Republicans and Democrats are on this force. Both Republicans and Democrats have been inspected. Both Republican and Democratic officers have been recommended for discharge. Both Republicans and Democrats, as a matter of fact, have been discharged under the recommendations of this force. Then away with all the bosh and rodomontade that attempts to degenerate this into a political controversy. The First Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Jones, has been a most faithful, painstaking, assiduous, and efficient officer, and those under him have worked hard.

Now, what are the facts connected with this force? The Government found that there were 13,000 letter carriers, officers who did not have to make any particular time; that is, if they did there was nobody to supervise the time. It was not like the postmaster, who had to get his mail ready at a certain time; it was not like the postal clerk, who had to meet his train at a particular time, and when it pulled in or pulled out had to have his mail ready for the schedule; but 13,000 men without supervision while on their routes. The result of it was that there were presented claims amounting to a million and a half dollars for overtime. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for overtime claims were accumulating annually! There were constant demands that there should be an increase of the force; and the Government determined, not under this Administration alone, but under past Administrations as well, to try by some means to inspect this force, to watch the overtime work, the faithfulness and efficiency of the force, and ascertain thereby whether the demands for increase of the force should be granted.

Mr. LOUD. There are a million and a half of those claims pending.

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, that amount already accumulated and pending. The annual demand was over a quarter of a million. There are pending $1,500,000 of overtime claims, and yet when an effort has been made to secure some supervision over this force, to make some effort at watchfulness, gentlemen get up and denounce every man engaged in this service as a "spy." They forget the fact that the very foundation of the post-office system is watchfulness. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] does not tell the House that even the officers of the Government will put marked money into the mails in order to catch an unfaithful official. This has been the custom always. Is not this spying? He rises and complains because notice has not been given to the letter carriers that on a certain day, at a certain hour, in a certain city, they were to be inspected. What would such an inspection amount to? Who would pay for such?

What are the facts concerning this force? "By their fruits ye shall know them." Right here, let me tell the gentleman, in answer to his charge of partisanship, that there was a larger per cent of Democrats in proportion to the force inspected who were reported against by these inspectors than of Republicans; and let him take that fact in connection with his effort to make this degenerate into a partisan matter. I realize that the gentleman was not so pronounced in that effort as the gentleman who interrogated him [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Now, what has been the action of this force? The reduction of force of letter carriers that was made possible by this inspection has amounted, between the 1st day of January, 1895, and the 1st day of last October, in salaries, to $157,000; the reduction of second-class offices to $51,000, or a total of $208,000; and then the applications for additional force that were found under this inspection to be unnecessary amounted to $79,200 per annum. So that the saving by this course has been in the short period between the 1st of January and the 1st of October, 1895, $288,050, and the force itself has cost the Government only $75,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am the last to believe in or to approve of any unnecessary espionage over public officers, but at the same time I tell the gentleman from New York that it is utterly impossible to keep a great force like this at work efficiently without care and vigilance. The gentleman himself admitted in his speech the other day, and he admits now, that there is a necessity for supervision of this force. What is he going to call his supervising men? Are they not going to watch the force? Are they going to be less vigilant than the existing inspectors? Are they going to be less careful? Are they going to be less faithful in making reports? If so, the results of the operation of the force will be a pretense, a hollow mockery. And if they are to be as watchful, as vigilant, and as successful as now, will they less fall under his ban as spies?

Mr. QUIGG. I ask the gentleman if he does not make a distinction between the sort of supervision which is fair and which gives the men an opportunity to be heard when charges are made against them, and that sort of surveillance which prejudges the case and gives the man no opportunity to reply?

Mr. McMILLIN. The suppositious case which the gentleman presents is wholly without foundation. There never has been any foundation for the gentleman's statement. On the contrary, there is more opportunity given for a man against whom charges are made to have a hearing under the existing system than there was under the old system of inspection, and in proof of that I will have read the regulations of the Department bearing upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am thankful for this courtesy.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. After the Clerk reads the regulations. I send to the Clerk's desk to have read the regulations of the Department upon this subject, from which the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] will see, first, that every officer accused of any wrongdoing has an opportunity to be heard before he is discharged, and, secondly, that under the old regulations of the Department, and before the present First Assistant Postmaster-General came into the office, all that was necessary for a discharge was to state that it was "for the good of the service," and the discharge came of course.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purpose of avoiding unjust removals of clerks and carriers in the classified service, and to avoid embarrassment and annoyance to the Department and postmasters with reference thereto, postmasters in free-delivery offices are hereby notified that the following policy prevails in the Post-Office Department and will be enforced:

All removals and new employments of clerks and changes in rosters must be reported to the First Assistant Postmaster-General as soon as made.

No carrier shall be removed except for cause, and upon written charges filed with the Post-Office Department, and of which the carrier shall have full notice and an opportunity to make defense.

No resignations requested by the postmaster, or by anyone for him, will be accepted by the Department.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT. How long after the violation, or alleged violation, of a rule occurs is it before it is reported to the Department, and where is the report made?

Mr. McMILLIN. As I understand, it is made to the First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. BENNETT. Here in Washington?

Mr. McMILLIN. Here in Washington.

Mr. BENNETT. When is it returned to the local post-office?

Mr. McMILLIN. I am not advised as to that, but suppose it is done as soon as conveniently may be.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it not a fact that these reports are returned to the post-offices of the respective cities, the places where the violations are charged to have occurred, so long after the occurrence that the men have lost all evidence?

Mr. McMILLIN. I think not. I get my information from the First Assistant Postmaster-General himself, in addition to what is contained in his report, which deals very carefully with this subject. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] will find on investigation that when charges are preferred against an officer an opportunity is given him in every instance to have a hearing, an opportunity that was not given him under the old rules, at least not as a matter of right. The person charged is given an opportunity to be heard and to make any explanation that it is possible for him to make.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it not a matter of fact that in most cases these reports are made so long after the violation of the rule that an investigation is rendered absolutely useless because the man can not present evidence for his defense?

Mr. McMILLIN. On the contrary, I take it that the state of things pictured by the gentleman does not exist and can not exist, from the fact that the records show that a very large per cent of those against whom charges are preferred are restored permanently, some of them being suspended perhaps for a few days or a few weeks. In every instance an opportunity is given the person accused to be heard, and the very time and place and circumstances of his alleged offense are laid bare, so that he can explain anything in connection with it that can be explained.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. If I may interrupt the gentleman, I will say that in the town where I live there was just such a case. Charges were preferred against one of the post-office employees, but he was given a full opportunity to be heard and to present all that he had to say in his defense.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is an actual confirmation of what I had understood to be the practice of the Department. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] ought to bear in mind that inspection is good not for the Government alone, but also for the employee. It is one of the best shields that can be had to distinguish and protect the faithful from the unfaithful officer, to put permanency in the service where it belongs, to give promotion to the man who deserves it, to overcome any "politics" that might otherwise enter into the case, and to allow a man's record to be the foundation for his promotion or his reduction. I am glad that the gentleman from New York in his speech here the other day admitted, as he now admits, the necessity for some kind of inspection. In that speech he said, speaking of the First Assistant Postmaster-General: "Let him prepare a scheme which will provide a system of roundsmen for the carriers. Roundsmen would be the proper inspectors of the carriers." It seems that the gentleman wants to designate his force by a new name; but is he going to take away from them the right to report on delinquents? Is he going to rob them of the right to watch over the service which they are put to guard? If so, his force will be of no value. If not, it will simply be a force equivalent to the one that is provided here, but bearing a different name.

But to show how thoroughly the Post-Office Department has felt the necessity of this force and to show the gentleman that all he has to do to get what he wants in the way of providing a force for this service is to carry out the recommendations of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the annual report of that officer.

The Clerk read as follows:

In view of the great saving effected and the general improvement in the service, especially in the large cities, I would recommend the employment of a number of men in the larger offices whose regular duty it shall be to inspect the work of carriers, make suggestions as to extensions and changes of routes, and, in fact, to have a general supervision of the work of carriers outside of post-offices.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Does the Department officer send these agents to a particular city on request of the postmaster of that city or on his own motion?

Mr. McMILLIN. I have not consulted the First Assistant Postmaster-General on that subject, nor do I recollect that his report makes any statement upon the point. But I take it that if complaints were filed by a number of citizens or by the postmaster of a particular city, or if from any other source it should be ascertained that the force was inefficient, the Department would send out these inspectors to ascertain the cause. The gentleman will remember that in our postal service, whenever complaint is made by the humblest member of the community that letters are not being handed to him regularly, or that registered matter has not come in proper form—whenever any complaint of that kind is made from whatever source the Government sends an inspector—one of the old force—even sends him in disguise to that community; and often before the postmaster knows of his presence the inspector has completed his investigation and left the city.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Is there any reason why the postmaster of a given city can not be intrusted with this work of keeping the carriers in proper training and under proper control?

Mr. McMILLIN. As a matter of fact, the Post-Office Department has found—and I think the gentleman will see that the finding is probably correct—that in the large cities of the country, with the great duties devolving upon the postmasters there, it is utterly impossible for the postmaster to keep the run of every letter carrier. The gentleman will remember that there are 13,000 of these carriers; and it is as utterly impossible for the few postmasters of the cities in which they operate to keep the run of the work of these carriers as it would be for them to keep the run of Congressional proceedings here.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman knows of no postmaster anywhere in the country who would make any such concession with regard to himself—that he is not competent to perform his duties.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman himself, if he had less ability or less opinion of his ability, I take it, and were postmaster of the great city of New York, would not feel that he was competent to keep the run of every letter carrier in that city.

Mr. QUIGG. No; but I should feel——

Mr. McMILLIN. Besides, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that neither he nor I nor any other member of this House or of the Senate has ever given to the postmasters of these cities any force with which to keep watch of these officials.

Now, in what I say I do not wish to make any wholesale charge against the 13,000 letter carriers of the United States. On the contrary, I am very glad to say that in a large number of cities inspected they were found to be in absolutely perfect working order and no complaints were reported against the carriers. I know that this is a great force. I know that in the main it is very efficient. I know that generally its members discharge their duties well, but I also know that you can not put 13,000 men to work in any line without there being required some supervision of their work beyond what the postmaster of the city, who has, perhaps, a thousand men under his control, can give.

Mr. QUIGG. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say in reply to his suggestion——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I am very much obliged, Mr. Chairman, for the indulgence of the Committee of the Whole in extending my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, not many months ago I went into the New York post-office. I found there several hundred clerks at work. I saw in the room in which they were employed a bridge something like the Rialto at Venice. It stretched across the apartment and was covered with sashes and blinds. In short, it was a sort of a duck blind. [Laughter.] Those inside could turn the slats and look into the room the same as a sultana might peep out of a harem. [Laughter.] I asked what it was.

"Why," was the reply, "it is a blind for the post-office spies."

"What are they doing there?"

"They are watching the one or two hundred post-office clerks below, for fear some one of them might steal a letter or do something in defiance of the rules."

"And who watches the spies?" I asked.

"Nobody." [Laughter and applause.]

Sir, why is it that the assumption is made that the spies are all honest and that the clerks and letter carriers are all dishonest? [Applause.] I say that informers ought always to be regarded with suspicion. History proves this. Honest men are not usually employed in dogging the footsteps of their fellow-men. Spies are not welcome guests in the families of honest men.

Mr. Chairman, we have a spy system in the city of New York. An organization known there as the Vigilance League sowed the city with spies to watch the officers of the police department. And what was the result? Look at the records in the courts of that city. There have been fully as many spies convicted of blackmail as police officers convicted of bad conduct.

I shall vote for the proposition of my friend from New York [Mr. QUIGG] with pleasure. While I acknowledge—and any man must acknowledge—the propriety of having what are called special agents to investigate post-offices where letters have been stolen or defalcations occur, I see no reason why spies should be placed at the heels of men whose honor has never been questioned.

Any letter carrier with an honest record is entitled to the same treatment as the Postmaster-General and his assistants; but the Postmaster-General and his assistants, I regret to say, do not look upon it in that light. Here is a special order:

That hereafter no postmaster, post-office clerk, letter carrier, railway postal clerk, or other postal employee shall visit Washington, whether on leave with or without pay, for the purpose of influencing legislation by Congress. Any such employee who violates this order is liable to removal.

I shall not read the whole order, Mr. Chairman; I have not time. But I insist that the post-office clerk and the letter carrier ought to be entitled to the same privilege in Congress as the Postmaster-General and his assistants. They are substantially debarred under this order from approaching their Congressmen. I could prove this from documents on my desk if I had the time to read them. There is no man in this House who has served on a committee where the interests of Government employees are canvassed who will not be surprised at the issuance of this order. Take the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Naval Affairs. Is there a member of either who has not been importuned day and night in the corridors of the Capitol or elsewhere to support some bill in which either army officers or navy officers are personally interested? Why do you draw the line on the post-office clerk and the letter carrier?

Mr. LOUD. Do you not think it is a practice that ought to be stopped in all Departments of the Government?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think that you ought to begin your work at the head of the stream, and not at its mouth. Do not play the farce of the wolf and the lamb, and muddy the water at the expense and to the injury of the postal employees. Apply it to all alike if you are going to apply it at all. The postal clerk and the letter carrier ought to have the same facilities for reaching the ear of Congress as the heads of Departments, and I think that on this proposition even my friend from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE], a distinguished member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, will fully agree with me. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELKNAP. Mr. Chairman, I am most sincerely and honestly in favor of the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG]. I am not in favor of voting the money of the people by the Congress of the United States to be used for such an unmanly and un-American purpose and such uncalled-for work as this clause of the bill contemplates.

Some gentlemen seem to think that the letter carriers as a class are corrupt and negligent. I deny that to be a fact, and I propose to show that it is not true. Take my own city of Chicago as an illustration. This system was working there for weeks, and after weeks of spying upon 1,093 men employed as letter carriers this was the result: Reports were made upon the conduct of 800 men. Six hundred and twenty-four were reported as absolutely correct.

But of course the spies had to make some kind of a showing, and I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] when he asks, "Who watches the spies?" They had to do something. Now, how do we know that their reports are correct? One hundred and seventy-six reports were investigated——

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. BOATNER. In the Chicago cases to which you refer, were the parties reported against given an opportunity to exonerate themselves in that way?

Mr. BELKNAP. I am just about coming to that.

Mr. BOATNER. Because, if so, that investigation is what watches the spies. If the spy makes a false report the investigation sure to follow is the means by which the spy himself is watched.

Mr. BELKNAP. I regard the system as uncalled for, unmanly, and un-American.

I was going on to say that the cases of 176 of these men were investigated, 55 were merely reprimanded, 90 were suspended for one or two days each, and 16 removed, and upon the authority of the Post-Office Department afterwards I say that these men would have been removed anyway, notwithstanding the fact that the reports were made against them.

Mr. MCMILLIN. How could they discover and report except by inspection? The gentleman says these men would have been removed anyway. Now, who made the inspection?

Mr. BELKNAP. The postmaster of Chicago and his subordinates.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then, according to the gentleman's own idea, they are spies themselves on the employees?

Mr. BELKNAP. They merely performed the duties of their office.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But you ought to be willing, in view of your position, to discharge them from office because they spy on the others. Where is the distinction?

Mr. BELKNAP. Because I have perfect confidence in the postmaster of Chicago and know his character and ability.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Oh, well, then it is the official, and not the nature of the service, that the gentleman finds fault with?

Mr. BELKNAP (continuing). He does his work in a careful and manly way.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] casts a slur upon all the letter carriers of the city of Chicago. On March 6 he said that they were accustomed, not in one case, but in more than one case, to use their street-car tickets to pay their special assessments, and he said that the records of the Post-Office Department would show that to be the fact. I went to the Post-Office Department, and upon authority of that Department I will say that three years ago one man did wrong. He did save his car tickets, and when asked the question what he did with the money—a few dollars—his reply was: "I paid a sewer assessment." That was one case, but the gentleman from California, by his language, reflects upon every letter carrier in Chicago.

I regard these letter carriers as honorable, upright men. As I go from my home downtown every morning I meet many of them. It is my pleasure to stop and greet them. I care not what their politics are. I do not think that question enters into this matter at all. On the coats of some of them I note bronze buttons, showing them to be the survivors of the grandest army the world has ever known. I doubt not that many others fought for a cause that was lost, but which they sincerely believed to be right, and for that I give them my high regard and sincere respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. BELKNAP was extended five minutes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Now, will the gentleman permit me right there to ask him one question?

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. You say that the 16 carriers in Chicago to whom reference was made would have been discharged anyway?

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Had reports been made by the postmaster at Chicago recommending their discharge?

Mr. BELKNAP. The postmaster there, as I understand the case, would have discharged them himself. Their conduct was such as to justify their discharge.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But had he, as a matter of fact, recommended their discharge to the Postmaster-General?

Mr. BELKNAP. I do not know that he had recommended it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then——

Mr. BELKNAP. I can not give up all my time to you, sir. Pardon me——

Mr. MCMILLIN. The committee extended your time.

Mr. BELKNAP. I beg your pardon. I did not mean to be selfish, but I maintain that the fact is that this investigation did not cause the discharge of these men. It did not amount to anything in that respect. Now, these men are honorable, upright, worthy public servants. I have seen them in the city of Chicago during the summer dropping in the streets from the heat and in the winter wading through the snow and ice, and I do not believe that it is the wish of the people of the United States that our Government should sink so low as to use the taxpayers' money for prying and spying upon a class of worthy, hard-working servants. [Applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. LOUD. Before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question. The gentleman has not used all his time. The gentleman has referred to a matter that I hoped would not be brought before this House again, and that was a reference that he made to Chicago. I hold in my hand a letter that the gentleman now forces me to put into the RECORD. When I get the floor I hope the gentleman will be present, because I propose to criticise something that I sincerely hoped I would not be forced to present to this House.

Mr. WHITE. Do not fail to present it.

Mr. BOATNER. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeds, I should like to ask that the pending amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt—in fact, I am positive—from an examination of the reports for many years back of the mail depredation division as to the convictions, as well as to the number of arrests, that the carriers and postal subordinates of the mail service are exceptionally honest men. The records show, in the vast number of this force, only a very limited number of convictions, as well as a very limited number of arrests. I do not think that any man upon this floor can question the integrity of this great body of men. The proposition in the bill that comes from the committee is to make an increase of 30 inspectors in the mail-depredation force. It places these appointments under the regular force of the Department. They are subject to civil-service examination and are assigned to the respective divisions of the 12 territorial divisions of the country.

In the Fifty-first Congress the appropriation for this force was $200,000.

When we entered the Fifty-second Congress, upon the report of the Postmaster-General, it was submitted that the accounts of the postmasters of the fourth class were in such a condition that no settlement could be made through the Auditor, and it was necessary that special agents should visit a large number of fourth-class postmasters in order to adjust and inspect their accounts. We increased that appropriation $100,000 for that special purpose—the inspection of the accounts of postmasters of the fourth class—and there was but limited debate and no clamor either as to partisanship or spy system. The next session, that work having been almost completed, there was a reduction to $235,000. In the following session there was appropriated $235,000; the first session of the next Congress, $300,000; again $300,000, under which the Department is now operating, and the proposition in the bill is to increase the force, giving 30 additional inspectors.

Now, you must understand that this inspection force has the supervision of everything that pertains to the Post-Office Department as to irregularity, and further, it runs as to the integrity and the honesty of the entire subordinate force of upward of 30,000 clerks, postal clerks, and letter carriers, as well as the 70,000 postmasters and all contractors. I am very slow to believe, with my long acquaintance and knowledge of the honorable gentleman at the head of the Post-Office Department to-day, General Wilson, that he would be guilty of doing anything either un-American or unmanly, or any official act that would take from the character of any of his subordinate force. I believe that he is just as honest in endeavoring to give a good administration of the Post-Office Department as Congress is in voting appropriations to carry out his recommendations.

In 1888 we passed the eight-hour law, predicated upon the fact that longer labor on the part of the carrier force was severe and extremely exhausting, and therefore there should be a limitation to his labor. What has been the result? A few days ago in the urgent deficiency bill we put in $300,000 for overtime. We have already appropriated for overtime through the eight-hour law almost a million and a half dollars, and there are upward of 4,000 unadjusted cases in the Department of Justice that will take a million dollars more. Therefore $2,500,000 has been paid or will be paid by the Government for overtime. I am submitting this brief statement in order to show how the Department first ascertained the great neglect of duty in the letter-carrier service. The Department also discovered in the examination of overtime cases that men delayed on their routes were slow in their deliveries and other irregularities in order that they might secure overtime allowances. This determined the entering upon the larger field of an investigation as to whether the carriers were performing their duties upon their respective routes. There is no carrier in the service, there is no postal clerk, there is no post-office clerk who does not know that there are at all times schemes, or, as the gentleman has called them, "spy operations," in order to test his integrity and honesty. In the boxes in the great cities the inspection force is continually placing decoy letters containing money and every device possible under the system of inspection to test their integrity and their honesty. Now, there is no objection to that; they do not even complain. We never heard any question upon that line of spy operation; but the moment you come to the proposition as to seeing whether the carrier does his full duty on his route, that moment you rise in rebellion. Now, let me tell gentlemen one thing. You will spend for your carrier force $13,000,000 in this bill for next year. You have in that force to-day about 13,000 men. Now, I ask any gentleman on this floor, if, in the subordinate force in your own manufacturing establishments or great business enterprises, whatever may be the business, you do not go into the greatest detail of management to see whether your force of men perform their full duty or that you get a full return for the pay that you give them for the work? A force of 13,000 men necessitates supervision.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. LOUD. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKLER. My question is this: Are not all the people watching these carriers, watching them all the time, every day while they are on their routes; and I will ask if it is not true that every family and every individual of a family have their eyes upon these letter carriers and that the whole community watches them?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say no to the gentleman. Servants in the great cities go to the doors, and not the families; and where a member of the family receives the mail minor derelictions are overlooked.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. But do not the families know when the mail arrives?

Mr. BINGHAM. They get the letters.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Do not they know if the mails have been delayed?

Mr. BINGHAM. They do, and they do not complain if it is half an hour or so late.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. If it becomes a habit they complain.

Mr. BINGHAM. Business men take cognizance of it in some form as a rule, but not always.

Permit me to state to the gentleman that this whole inspection service has been subject to criticism, and I myself am free to say that my own city perhaps suffered more than any other large community, and I condemn many of the methods adopted; but that is past.

Upon the reports of the agents there seemed to be a larger dereliction in Philadelphia than in any other city. I have been appealed to by a large number of the carriers in connection with their cases where they have been reported. I have gone to the Department and have examined for official dereliction a number of them. I found many neglects of duty. I have found at times a severity of punishment that I did not think warranted, and I have called the attention of the Department to those cases, claiming that the punishment was too extreme for the offenses committed. I am free to say that in many cases I found that there had been marked neglect upon the part of the carrier running his route as well as in his daily habits. Under a rule of the Department every accused carrier had had his hearing, and I read his testimony in connection with the testimony of the agents of the Department. The report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General exhibits just what this work of the agents has been, or spies, as the gentleman calls them. There are over 700 free-delivery offices altogether. I read:

Total number of offices investigated, 151; total number of carriers employed at these offices, 4,075; carriers reprimanded for various irregularities, 208; carriers suspended for falsifying trip reports, 57—

Certainly nobody can question the propriety of punishment for that offense.

Carriers suspended for failure to collect from street letter boxes, 49—

That is not a very large number.

Carriers suspended for drinking while on duty and loitering, 302—

A very small number out of the total of 4,075.

Carriers dismissed for drinking while on duty and loitering, 55.

There, gentlemen, you have the sum total of the work of these inspectors with reference to the carrier force.

Now, I know that during my own experience of six years as postmaster of the city of Philadelphia I had no means whatever of determining whether the carrier force then employed did their duty upon their routes, and there is no means to-day in the Department of determining that question, unless the Postmaster-General or the local postmaster has the right to make a detail of some of his force to inspect the work of the carrier or unless you enact new legislation looking to that end.

Mr. SPERRY. If there had been irregularities in your force of carriers while you were postmaster at Philadelphia, would not those irregularities have been reported to you within twenty-four hours, or to your subordinates?

Mr. BINGHAM. No. In all large post-offices there is what is called a book of complaints. Reports are made to the Department every month, and doubtless those reports have been the basis of the direction by the Department of this force of inspectors to certain localities rather than to others. There is a complaint clerk in every great office, and you come to the office and make your complaint that a letter mailed by you of such and such a date to such and such a place has failed to reach its destination, or that a letter mailed to you has failed to arrive, or that there has been delay in the delivery of a letter. A searcher is immediately sent out. Possibly investigation will show that the fault was in the man who sent the letter, but if not the investigation of the matter is continued. When the postmaster learns, through his complaint clerk, that on a certain day one or two or three or four money letters have been lost, or have failed to be delivered, or that other letters have been delayed, the chief of carriers is notified and an inspector, or a "spy," is sent out to test the boxes, to watch the carrier on that route, and to test his deliveries. Immediately the Department is notified that three or four money letters have been lost, and the Department, in its own way, proceeds to make an investigation, and the first thing you know is that the carrier or clerk, if guilty, is found out and caught by a decoy letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended five minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Could any letter carrier on any route while you were postmaster of Philadelphia have been derelict in his duty in any marked degree without that fact being brought to your attention?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am very sure he could, and very sure that it occurred. I have no doubt of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the question of politics in this legislation, I am free to say that I do not think there has been any politics in it. The inspector force of the Department to-day has as many Republicans upon it as there are Democrats. Further, it must be borne in mind that civil-service rules with reference to the letter-carrier force in offices employing upward of 50 carriers went into effect in 1883, and those rules have been in effect in the great offices ever since that date. We had four years of Democratic administration in Mr. Cleveland's first term, and we have had three years this time. The point I seek to make is that with civil-service methods applying to this force for fourteen years, during a period when different parties have been in control of the administration, the matter of politics has been largely eliminated. Men are selected under the civil-service rules. They dare not, whichever party they belong to, be partisans in the sense of being active. They dare not take an active part in conventions or in primaries. The force to-day in the great offices is absolutely without politics, in my judgement, and I believe the inspector force also is without politics. That seems to me to be the natural and inevitable result of the operation of the civil-service rules since 1883.

Mr. RAY. This provision in the bill proposes to increase these inspectors by 30?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; the regular force.

Mr. RAY. And it proposes to legalize the appointment of the 30?

Mr. BINGHAM. It gives 30 additional inspectors for the next fiscal year.

Mr. RAY. But we have had a fixed number for the last two years or more, have we not?

Mr. BINGHAM. I stated in the first part of my remarks that in the Fifty-first Congress——

Mr. RAY. I want to ask the gentleman a question or two so as to get at the real point. Is it not a fact that we have had the existing number of inspectors for the last two years?

Mr. BINGHAM. You have had $300,000 appropriated for this force during the last two years.

Mr. RAY. And it is proposed here to change the law——

Mr. BINGHAM. No; it is proposed to increase the force, not to change the law.

Mr. RAY. If you increase the force by 30, do you not change the existing law?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; you simply increase the force under the law.

Mr. RAY. You increase the appropriation so as to provide for 30 additional officers of this class. Now, we have had officers of this kind at work; and we are appropriating this money, as I understand, to extend this kind of work unless this amendment is adopted. Let me ask, is there any greater need for these men than there has been in the past?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will answer the gentleman in this way: I believe that, in view of the fact that there has been no inspection of the carrier force for years and years in any thorough way as to their fidelity and industry, men who have been on certain routes for a long period run their routes to suit themselves; that the increase is necessary to give a better service in the large cities.

Mr. RAY. Has it been developed that these carriers are dishonest men?

Mr. BINGHAM. On the contrary, as I have stated, the exhibit for years past has shown that not only the carriers, but the postal clerks and post-office clerks, numbering upward of 30,000 men, are a body of the most honest and trustworthy men in the country.

Mr. RAY. Then, if they are "a body of the most honest men in the country," what is the sense of going to work now and appropriating thousands of dollars to create and pay spies to spy upon "the most honest body of men in the country"? The object is simply this—to create 30 or 60—I do not know the exact number——

Mr. BINGHAM. Thirty is the additional number of inspectors proposed.

Mr. RAY. To create 30 spies for the purpose of the coming Presidential campaign [applause], and to have them recognized and paid out of the public Treasury. That is all there is in it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply answer I do not concur in the gentleman's view and conclusion.

Mr. RAY. That is the purpose; it is the body and the soul of the whole proposition. If gentlemen of the House will look into it, they will be convinced that that is the truth of this matter. I for one do not propose to submit to this unless I am compelled to do so—not at this stage of the game. [Applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Having read to the House the result of this inspection, I will read another paragraph, which, I think, will show the gentleman that there is very little partisanship exhibited in the work recently done:

> The personnel of the carriers' force at 60 of the 151 offices examined was found to be above the average, the carriers being faithful and energetic.

Now, as I have already stated——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to have three minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York or any other gentleman had under his control a body of 13,000 men, carriers, or 32,000 men, subordinates in the postal service, he would immediately arrange some system of thorough supervision; and I say to the gentleman that in the large cities there is no inspection of the carrier force running to their fidelity and industry—no system of inspection by which the postmaster can determine how faithfully they do their work. The national banks do not complain of the fact that at any moment on any day the national-bank inspector may come down upon them and demand an examination of all the books of the establishment. No man can object to a fair, honest supervision of his work, whether he is a carrier or a postal clerk or any other employee of the Government, provided he is doing his duty. Sir, the surprise to me is that in the examinations thus far entered into there has not been found larger dereliction, because I can readily understand that if a man is on the carrier force for ten or fifteen years, running his route without any supervision, he will run it to suit himself; but whether in doing so he is running it in the best way for his people can only be ascertained by official inspection.

As I stated in the beginning, the exhibits in the large cities show the necessity of some supervision of this force. I do not care in what form you institute that supervision. Increase if you choose the regular inspectors' force by adding 30 new members; give us roundsmen or captains of divisions in the great cities, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] has suggested; give us some proper supervision to make the carrier force as efficient as that force can be made; and then you will give us what we have a right to ask. In giving such supervision Congress will give the country good legislation and the people will enjoy a better postal service.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to inspectors as long as the carrier who is accused of a violation of the rules of the Department has a fair chance in his own defense. As I understand, these special agents at present make their reports to the Post-Office Department here at Washington; those reports are afterwards transmitted to the post-office of the particular district, and notice is given to the carrier affected. The time that elapses between the alleged violation of the rules and the notification to the officer affected is so long that he loses all opportunity for getting any evidence in his favor. If he does find such evidence, it is by mere chance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after the clear and convincing and well-stated argument of my colleague [Mr. QUIGG], I do not deem it necessary to detain this Committee of the Whole with any extended remarks. Nor do I desire to disagree with our excellent Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. But I do hope that the committee will see its way clear to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

I trust the amendment will prevail.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, the proposition that the carrier service of the United States is composed of honest men, and that therefore any precautions which may be taken to insure fidelity in the performance of their duties is unnecessary, is one that sounds well; it is probably very agreeable to the carriers themselves, and it may be popular in districts where the carriers are numerous and where their political influence would have some weight; but, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it is utterly unsound.

We are continually reading in the newspapers of the great cities of the detection of carriers in systematic robberies of the mail and violations of duty. The question arises, then, how would such persons ever be detected unless the Government was prepared to adopt and does adopt necessary and effective means to make the discovery? How is any reflection made upon the 13,000 mail carriers employed in the United States because the Government takes necessary steps to guard the proper discharge of their duties and to discover such of them as may be dishonest? No doubt the vast majority of them are perfectly honest, but it is certain that all of them are not, and the proportion would be much larger if the supervision now exercised should be withdrawn.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has just read a statement showing the number of the reports of suspensions and removals under that system which enforces a prompt discharge of duty and insures honesty and accuracy in the work. If the means of detection had been removed, the duty in many instances no doubt would have been improperly performed or not performed at all.

What gentleman can say how many other offenses would have been committed had they known that they were not subject to any supervision at all; in other words, if they felt perfectly free from the watchful scrutiny of the Department?

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman allow me a question just there?

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. I understand you to be arguing in favor of the increase of force and salaries here?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes.

Mr. RAY. Now, then, if these officers are needed to-day, were they not needed also two years ago; and——

Mr. BOATNER. Probably not so much as now. The service has been and is being steadily increased.

Mr. RAY. Let me get in the whole question——

Mr. BOATNER. I am only answering the gentleman as he goes on.

Mr. RAY. Let me complete it. I asked, if this force was needed last year, is it not a singular fact that Congress made no provision for them? No suggestion of the kind was contained in any legislation by Congress, and if they were necessary why did not the Fifty-third Congress appropriate the money to provide for them?

Mr. BOATNER. The necessity probably existed then as much as now. Certainly it has always been necessary to maintain some sort of inspection of the postal service, but the necessity as exists now, I suppose, had not been presented to the consideration of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and hence no appropriation for the purpose was made by the Fifty-third Congress.

I infer, Mr. Chairman, that the necessity for the employment of this force has arisen out of the increase in the carrier service, and that it is the intention and effort of the Post-Office Department to increase the efficiency of the service year by year, and the next Congress may find some other such step necessary.

Now, to say that the 13,000 men employed in the mail-carrier service are all honest men, and that none of them need watching, is, in my judgment, the veriest nonsense. There is nothing in it. The cashiers and officers of our banks are supposed to be honest, but they are under bond for the discharge of the duties devolved upon them as bank officers, and are under the severest penalties of the law if they fail to perform their duties; and yet it is found necessary to have bank inspections, to which a bank is at any moment subject. It is to be presumed that all of the postmasters throughout the country are honest and capable men; they are under bond for the discharge of their duties, and yet the office is subject to the inspection of the Department at any time, and the law rigidly requires that they shall deposit all public money that comes into their hands in a certain specified way, and the use of it otherwise is an embezzlement.

Then, where, in the adoption of this provision, is there a reflection upon the carriers of the United States when they are subjected to a proper and necessary supervision in order to discover infractions of duty, peculation, and fraud?

This provision, as I understand, is to enable the Post-Office Department to employ such force as may be necessary for the protection of the interests of the people themselves. The objections urged against it are, in my judgment, fallacious. The Postmaster-General would not have recommended the increase unless satisfied that it was necessary for the protection of the public and to give increased efficiency to the postal service——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious indeed to do nothing that will in the least cripple any branch of the Post-Office Department, and yet I am, as I believe everybody in the hearing of my voice ought to be, utterly opposed to changing the fundamental idea—that thoroughly American idea—that we ought to assume men to be innocent before they are charged with guilt.

Running all through this spy system is the assumption that 13,000 men, carrying thousands and perhaps millions of dollars every day of their lives, are all criminals, but have not yet been convicted. When we remember that heretofore the inspectors in the Post-Office Department were sent out not to dog the footsteps of honest men, but to find out who had been guilty of criminality when offenses had been actually committed, we can realize the great change sought to be made in the system.

The purpose of their appointment is now wholly changed, and we are asked to allow the entire force of inspectors to be let loose for the purpose of watching men to see whether they have even a guilty thought, although they have never been guilty of any wrongful action.

I remember that some years ago a commission came from Great Britain to look into the workings of our Post-Office Department. They came, as most English commissions come, with the purpose of criticising adversely the workings of that Department; but when they had scrutinized every part of the workings of it they went home and said that it even surpassed the English department.

It this be the case, should we not say that without the aid of spies at all our Department has been a very good one indeed, and ask ourselves, why should we throw upon the men who built up this Department into such a state of excellence the odium of spying upon them? Why should we put upon this great body of men, who, by reason of their honesty and ability, have commended themselves not alone to the people of our own country, but to the people of other countries, the odium of saying that they ought to be watched? It seems to me that we ought not to do that. We should have some higher purpose; that is, to say to our servants, when they have done so well, not that we will watch them more closely hereafter, but that we will repose greater confidence in them hereafter than we have in the past, thus evincing our appreciation.

The practical point that I want to make is, that this is an entire turning around from the duty that inspectors heretofore performed, which was to go out and find a criminal when criminality had been proven, but the criminal was not known. This spy system is for an entirely different purpose, and that is to assume that all the carriers, all who are connected with the Post-Office Department, are criminals. It is changing our post-office corps from men into mere machines, and we are setting men to watch these machines, regardless of the thought that we are dealing with beings having conscience, heart, reason, soul, who must feel keenly that faithful and intelligent service does not commend them to the confidence of their employers. We are impugning all these men in a way I think they do not deserve, and I plead with the members of this House, remembering the service of these men, remembering the superb state of the service, not to throw on these officials this unnecessary, this thoroughly un-American odium and imputation. [Applause.]

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, this is nothing more nor less than a plain business proposition which is presented to the House. The question of having inspectors is not a new one in the postal service of the country. It has been in existence for many years, and the proposition pending here this morning is simply to increase the force of inspectors to a number sufficient to do the work. That is all there is in it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I should like to ask my friend a question right there.

Mr. KYLE. Well, sir——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Is it necessary to have two inspectors to five letters in a little town in Michigan?

Mr. KYLE. I do not think that is necessary, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think that such a case as that exists. If it does, however, I suppose that it is an exception.

I want to argue this proposition now. And I will eliminate from it, if you please, all the benefits that have resulted from the inspector force heretofore and treat it as though it was a new proposition presented here to-day for the first time. I present it to you as business men.

If you were managing your own affairs, if you were taking care of your own private business, and it was necessary to employ 13,000 men to do that work, I ask you what man there is of you who would turn those men loose without any supervision? We not only employ 13,000 men to do this work, but we take $12,450,000 of the people's money to pay them.

Now, is it businesslike, is it an exhibition of good judgment, is it a display of good common sense, to turn loose 13,000 men in this country who are performing public duties, pay them $12,450,000 a year, and not have them supervised or looked after?

Now, I submit that to you as a business proposition, and I ask you to revolve it over in your own minds and see whether you think you would be acting with sound discretion if you were to adopt that sort of policy.

But gentlemen say that these men are under the surveillance of spies, and that this appropriation is nothing more nor less than an encouragement of the spy system. Why, there is nothing said about spies in this bill. There is nothing new in this bill. This practice has been carried on in this country for more than a quarter of a century. Why do you inveigh against it? What is the purpose of it? What is the reason of it? You fly in the face of the fact that the experience of the Post-Office Department shows great good and large saving have resulted from these inspections. But gentlemen say these men ought not to have had these inspectors to look after them, and that they are brought up and discharged without trial and without investigation. Why, gentlemen, when you make that statement you simply fly in the face of the facts of the case and make assertions that are utterly unjustifiable. Let us see what is the regulation of the Department upon that proposition. I read from the Rules and Regulations of the Department:

For the purpose of avoiding unjust removals of clerks and carriers in the classified service, and to avoid embarrassments and annoyance to the Department and postmasters with reference thereto, postmasters of free delivery offices are hereby notified that the following policy prevails in the Post-Office Department and will be enforced:

All removals and new employments of clerks and changes in rosters must be reported to the First Assistant Postmaster-General as soon as made.

No carrier shall be removed except for cause and upon written charges filed with the Post-Office Department, and of which the carrier shall have full notice and an opportunity to make defense.

This shows that provision is made by the Department to prevent the thing that some gentlemen claim is done, viz, the discharging of carriers without cause and without trial.

Now, when you put this inspection system forward, you only follow that which the dictates of good, common, business sense suggests; and then the Postmaster-General, by the regulations of the Department, says they shall not be removed until they have had a full opportunity to be heard. I happen to have had a little experience on that subject. I have only had one case—that of a friend who came here from New Hampshire.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair understands the gentleman to request further time. Without objection, the gentleman will be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. KYLE (continuing). He told me that a kinsman of his who was a letter carrier in the city in which he lived had been removed. He asked me to go to the Post-Office Department and introduce him to the First Assistant. This I did; and when he stated his business to the First Assistant, the First Assistant said to him, "I have investigated that case and have reinstated the man to whom you refer." Here is not only the rule that he has laid down by which he proposes to be governed, but here is a case in point, where a man was, after investigation, reinstated. In fact, no instance has been cited by those who oppose the inspector system of a single case where a man has been improperly discharged. Then what comes of all this talk about men being removed without cause?

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KYLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. QUIGG. Did he get his salary during the period for which he had been unjustly suspended?

Mr. KYLE. I did not inquire about the salary; and, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that that has anything to do with the question now under consideration. The question that we are trying to investigate and argue out here is, what are the best interests of the country, whether or not it is a proper thing for the Department to have these inspectors to look after this vast army of men and after the proper expenditure of $12,450,000?

I call the attention of the House to the fact that it is not only in the postal service that inspectors are necessary. It is not only there where organization and supervisions are necessary. You take any department of business in common life and supervision is necessary. You take any other Department of this Government and supervision is necessary. We have bank inspectors; and there is no other Department of the Government in which you can go that this necessity is not recognized.

Mr. MEREDITH. And if they do their duty they will have nothing to fear.

Mr. KYLE. And as my good friend from Virginia says, if they do their duty they will have nothing to fear. In all the cases cited here there is not one where a carrier has been discharged improperly. Not one. You bring up cases and you state that they were cases where after investigation they have been temporarily suspended and laid off for a given length of time; but you have never cited a case where a man has, under this spy system, this system that is sought to be made odious by these gentlemen who oppose it, where an innocent man has been made to suffer by it.

Now, I take this position, further, Mr. Chairman, that this inspection system is not only necessary for the good of the service, but for the best interest of the faithful carriers.

The faithful, efficient, honest letter carrier is not afraid to have an inspector upon his track. He knows that under the rules of the Department if he is improperly charged with any offense he can go before an officer whose duty it is to see that justice is done him. If his skirts are clear, he has no fear upon that ground. If he has not performed his duty, what man is there in this House who will say that he ought not to be discharged? You would discharge him from your private business if he did not perform his duties properly, and you would look after him closely, too. You would say that he ought to be discharged from the Government service if he did not execute his duties properly. Why? Because it is your duty, as it is the duty of the Postmaster-General, to try to enforce such laws and such rules and regulations as will secure good and efficient service to the people of this country, whose representatives you are, and who will look after you, too, when you neglect your duties to them.

Mr. RAY. Do you think that these letter carriers ought to have spies or "inspectors" on their track before they are accused of wrongdoing, simply to watch them to see whether they are honest or dishonest?

Mr. KYLE. Would the gentleman from New York take an army of men like this which we are considering, pay them the amount of money that these men get, and turn them loose without any supervision? Would he do that in his own private business?

Mr. RAY. I would not "turn them loose," but I would set them about their business and assume that they were honest until they were discovered to be dishonest. I would not spy upon them as though they were bound to be dishonest.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KYLE. I do not like to be discourteous, Mr. Chairman, but I have not time to be interrupted.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the time of Mr. KYLE was extended five minutes.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does the gentleman draw the distinction between supervision of a business and espionage or spying?

Mr. KYLE. I think the distinction which the gentleman tries to make is one without a difference. I do not care whether you call it supervision, or what you call it. We all know what it is, and we all know what this bill seeks to accomplish and what it does accomplish, and that is supervision of this force. Now, Mr. Chairman, all this talk about "spies" and about the suspicion of dishonesty on the part of letter carriers has nothing to do with the proposition before us. It is merely a business proposition that is presented to this committee, and I want to say here that until this morning when this question came up for discussion I never heard the matter of politics discussed in connection with it.

In the Post-Office Committee Republicans and Democrats went to work in an earnest and faithful manner, endeavoring, as I understood them, to do what was for the best interests of the service without regard to politics, and I do not believe that I have heard politics mentioned in the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads during this Congress. Therefore I say all the talk about this being merely a proposition to put 30 additional men, Democrats, upon this force "to travel from one end of the land to the other and do campaign work" has nothing to do with the question before us and ought not to be lugged into this discussion. Besides that, I may remind you that the Committee on the Post-Office is composed largely of Republicans, and it certainly could not have been the desire of the majority of that committee to recommend an increase of this force unless there was an imperative necessity for it. Therefore there can not be anything in that sally of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] except an appeal to what may possibly be conceived to be the prejudices existing in the minds of members of this Committee of the Whole; but I believe you will rise above that, gentlemen, when you pass upon this proposition.

The Post-Office Department tells us that these additional men are necessary for the protection and efficiency of the public service. Why not give them? Are you going to be driven from it because possibly some Democrat may get an appointment to perform this service? Let us assume for the moment that all the men appointed to do this work will be Democrats; still I say you ought to be above the possibility of being governed by such a groveling prejudice as that. There is nothing in that argument at all that appeals to the head. Now, consider the experience that the country has had with reference to this force, and you will find that it is abundantly proven, and can not be controverted, that great good has come out of it in the past. But, eliminating all that and taking the question as one of first impression, as if it were proposed now for the first time to inaugurate this system, I insist that it is one which appeals to the good, sound business sense of every member on this floor. I thank the committee for their attention.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Chairman, I desire only a very few minutes to say one or two things from a business standpoint—to adopt the language of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE]. I state today that the letter carriers of the United States are the most honest and efficient public servants we have. Why? Not because they are any better men than others; not because they are any more honest at heart; but because, by the very system under which they work, they are bound to be honest. Every citizen of the city of St. Louis, for instance, is a spy upon the services and the efficiency of every letter carrier there; not upon his personal habits, but upon the efficiency of his service. Six hundred thousand people in St. Louis are every day watching and ready to report any dereliction of duty by the letter carriers of that city. If a piece of mail is stamped as received at the St. Louis office at 7 a. m. and it is not delivered at my office until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, will not the postmaster immediately find me at his desk complaining of the carrier? If any piece of mail has miscarried or any neglect has been shown by any letter carrier in that great city, every person who is thereby injuriously affected will report him to the authorities under whose direction his work is done. In St. Louis, or in any great city, therefore, I say that the number of inspectors is just equaled by the number of persons who receive mail matter. The appropriation of $30,000 for any purpose, political or otherwise, to inspect the class of men whose very positions and duties subject them daily and hourly to the severest criticism and inspection, is a throwing away of the public funds which ought not to be considered for a moment.

My friends talk about a business proposition. Sir, we are not starting out to send 13,000 men into the field to work at a distance. We are continuing an efficient service of 13,000 men; we are continuing those men in positions where three, four, and five times a day they come under your inspection and mine. Every person to whom a carrier delivers a piece of mail is daily ready to report upon him as to his efficiency or his dereliction of duty.

Sir, I say there can be no question that the letter-carrier service of the United States is the best performed of any public service in this country—I care not where it may be. It is a better performed service than that of the Postmaster-General himself, because it is under more strict and continuous supervision.

I am unalterably opposed to the appropriation of one dollar more to continue a system which can do no good, but which simply subjects honest, efficient men to an espionage which is not fair, which is not right, which is not deserved, and which will not add one particle to the efficiency of this service.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Illinois who addressed the House a few moments ago to object not so much to the inspection of the letter carriers as to the fact that this inspection is performed by inspectors. The gentleman claimed, as I understood, that it is the duty of the postmaster in each city to make this inspection and investigation; that the postmasters have the right to make such inspection; that they are willing to make it, and do make it. I have no doubt that the postmaster at Chicago is equal or superior to most of the postmasters in the United States. I am perfectly willing to acquiesce in any statement that may be made in attestation of his efficiency. But I undertake to say, from a letter which I have on my desk and which I will publish with my remarks, that that postmaster, able and willing as he is, can not and does not see all the misconduct of the letter carriers occurring in the city of Chicago. No doubt as a mass they are honest men; but there is among them a certain proportion of misconduct.

In the letter to which I have referred instances are given, with the names of the carriers concerned, who, as the inspector alleges, are types in some respects, though not in all, of the great mass of the letter carriers. In one instance the carrier went on his beat twenty minutes late, got through in twenty-nine minutes, had eleven minutes at the other end, and recorded schedule time instead of actual time. In other words, he performed his duty in twenty-nine minutes and had thirty-three minutes to spare on his beat. As I understand, a portion of the conduct detailed in this letter is in violation of the rules and regulations of the Department. In addition to that, this case shows that this man had not a large enough beat, because he only used up in the performance of his duty one-half of the time allowed.

In another instance a carrier made the collection on his route in thirty-five minutes, visited three saloons, and reported at the office twenty-five minutes ahead of time.

This statement also goes to show that these men received free car tickets, eight a day; that they used not exceeding two, leaving six unused; that one man swapped routes with another and received all his car tickets for the swap; that instead of using his street-car tickets he walked, and still got through in one-half the schedule time.

In conclusion, this inspector states that an examination of nearly all the collectors at the central office showed that so far as concerns the time required on collection routes the same conditions exist throughout the entire central district as are disclosed in the statement of the two carriers to whom I have referred, Closson and Mortimer.

In those cases, it will be seen, Mr. Chairman, a great deal of economy could have been effected, and since this report was made has been effected, in the city of Chicago. It is shown also that these things were occurring under the eye of an honest, vigilant, capable postmaster; that he did not discover them; that they were not discovered until the inspectors were sent there.

The honest, faithful carrier does not object to being supervised; and even for those who may be disposed to go astray supervision is desirable, because if they realize that for their shortcomings they will be called to account, that they will be reprimanded or otherwise properly punished, they will be induced to pursue the path of duty and save themselves from dismissal. Sir, it seems to me there can be no more objection to having supervisors in a case of this kind than there can be to having policemen in a city or inspectors for a national bank.

I append to my remarks the letter to which I have referred:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., March 7, 1896.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request of yesterday, I have the honor to submit to you a statement in the cases of the two letter carriers removed at Chicago for stealing street-car tickets.

I quote from a report of the Chicago postal commission, composed of A. W. Machen, esq., Superintendent of the Free-Delivery System; James E. Stuart, esq., inspector in charge at Chicago, and R. E. Spangler, who reorganized the service at Chicago in the spring of 1894:

"On the morning of April 17, 1894, the chairman of the commission made a personal test of the collection route served by Letter Carrier C. A. Closson, with a view to ascertaining the time actually consumed by him in the performance of his duties and if he used the street-car tickets furnished him. This test showed that Mr. Closson reported for duty twenty minutes late, collected his route leisurely in twenty-nine minutes, used no street-car tickets, and reported at the office at the end of trip eleven minutes in advance of schedule time, recording schedule instead of actual time.

"On the following morning Commissioner Stuart made a test of the route adjoining that of Collector Closson and served by Letter Carrier Mortimer. This test showed that Mortimer reported promptly on time, collected his route in about thirty-five minutes, visiting three saloons, and reported at the office twenty to twenty-five minutes ahead of schedule time.

"These carriers were called before the commission and were carefully examined as to the actual time required by each to collect his route, the number of tickets furnished each, and the number actually used. Both admitted the truth of the statements above recited; stated that these conditions had obtained as long as they had collected on the routes; that these routes could be easily collected in from thirty to forty minutes, with the exception of one or two trips in the afternoon, and that neither of them had, as a rule, used to exceed two tickets per day, although the allowance is six.

"Mr. Closson admitted that it was his custom to spend ten to fifteen minutes on each trip in a hotel on his route, offering as an excuse that as he collected his route in less than the schedule, he had to go somewhere to kill time. He acknowledged that he had used street-car tickets in the partial payment of a street-paving bill, and that his family had used them, and that he now had a number at his house. (A search of his house, subsequently made by a post-office inspector, secured the return of 265 street-car tickets, and this in the face of the fact that but 155 had been given him for the current month, the allotment having been made on the 1st of the month.) In palliation of his offense, Mr. Closson insisted that it was a custom among the carriers to save what tickets they could and to use them for their own personal benefit, considering them as a perquisite of the office, and further, that as he could walk and collect his route within schedule time, he found it unnecessary to use street cars, and therefore assumed that he was entitled to the tickets saved that way. He stated that, in consideration of a transfer of tours, he had received from Collector Mortimer 30 tickets each month for three months, in the spring of 1893, and 75 on March 1, 1894.

"Being examined, Mr. Mortimer admitted having given Collector Closson all tickets received by him for three months in the spring of 1893, about 155 per month, and 75 more on or about March 4, 1894, in consideration of an exchange of tours, Mortimer taking the morning tour, which is considered the easier. It was also developed that this exchange of tours was effected without obtaining the consent of the superintendent of delivery or foreman of collectors, nor does it appear that this arrangement was ever known to either of these officers until brought to light by the investigation of this commission. Mr. Mortimer acknowledged having registered schedule time rather than that actually made, asserting that it was his understanding that he was privileged to do this, the only requirement being that he should not begin his collection before or finish it later than schedule time. He also admitted that he had visited three saloons on the first trip of that day, with three different persons, one of whom was Letter Carrier Holden. Mr. Holden on being called before the commission stated that while on duty he had taken a drink with Mr. Mortimer on his invitation, and also that he had made known to him the presence of Inspector Stuart, whom he had met on Mortimer's route.

"An examination of nearly all of the collectors at the central office showed that, in so far as the time required to collect the routes is concerned, the same conditions exist throughout the entire central district as those disclosed by the statements of Closson and Mortimer."

Very respectfully,

F. H. JONES,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. E. F. LOUD,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the House only a few minutes, for I expressed myself at some length on this subject last Saturday. Gentlemen on the other side who oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] proceed upon the assumption that there is at present no supervision of the carrier service. Why, sir, there is the postmaster, there is the assistant postmaster, there is the superintendent of carriers, there is the assistant superintendent of carriers. Whenever a carrier goes out on a trip he must record his name; when he returns he must do the same. If there were anything wrong in the conduct of these carriers it would be at once discovered by some of these officials, whose duty it is to see that the carriers properly perform their duty.

Yet you say there is no supervision. I said the other day, in the course of my remarks on this floor, that the system of inspection had grown to an enormous size. We started with but very few of these officials and it has grown to very large proportions, and yet gentlemen would seem to argue to-day that we have no inspection.

Why, sir, we have 110 men to-day engaged in this work throughout the country, and there never has been a time when an inspection was necessary that the postmaster could not, if necessary, get an inspector at once to assist him.

But according to some remarks made here it is said that the letter carriers who have been dismissed have been dismissed wrongfully.

Why, sir, when I was at home the other day some of the letter carriers in my own town who had been suspended by the operation of this spy system, through reports made by the men who had been sent for that purpose, and which system you propose to carry on in this bill, said to me that they were hung up five or six weeks without pay; and not only that, but they did not know whether the charges under which they were arrested before might not again be brought up against them at any moment, as no final action had yet been taken, and involve their removal from their positions. They did not know where they were or what to do; and not only that, but when they were told to go to work again and did return to the performance of their duties they felt as though they were liable at any hour to be dismissed from the service; and they said to me: "Mr. SPERRY, how can it be expected of us that we can do our work properly when we are all the time, daily and hourly, in fear of somebody pouncing down upon us? Why, we feel as though we were making more mistakes to-day than ever before in the history of the service since this spy system was adopted, for it unsettles and unnerves us when in the performance of our daily duties."

Two men called on me this morning, men high in official position in the Post-Office Department, and said to me that there had not been a blow struck since free delivery had become an accomplished fact in this country that had done so much damage and injury to the service as the adoption of the spy system, which it is now proposed to perpetuate by Congress in the pending measure.

I tell you, you may call the man an inspector, and can say that he is performing the regular duties of inspection, but tell me how it happens that after all this work was done last fall this Congress is now called on to indorse that which the present Post-Office administration forced on the people of the country in the last year? If we add the 30 inspectors, as proposed here, it is a substantial indorsement of what was done last fall, and an official of the Post-Office Department, who is competent to judge, told me that all they needed now was to get an indorsement by this Republican House of the iniquitous transactions of last fall. And I earnestly appeal to the House to put a stop to this unjust and demoralizing spy system by adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I think we have debated this question very fully, and I would like to come to some understanding about the closing of the debate. I suggest that the debate close in thirty minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, I think, suggested that he desired no more time.

Mr. QUIGG. So far as I am concerned, I think we have debated this quite fully, but still I have the closing of the argument, I presume.

Mr. LOUD. Well, I think the chairman of the committee ought to have a little opportunity.

Mr. QUIGG. Does the gentleman desire further debate on that side?

Mr. LOUD. I simply desire to have the closing of the debate.

Mr. QUIGG. Well, under the rule, if there is one, I think that rather pertains to this side. We have presented the proposition, and I might make the closing debate upon it myself.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think the gentleman ought to have that right.

Mr. QUIGG. However, I would be glad to come to an arrangement with the gentleman as to time.

Mr. LOUD. Then, Mr. Chairman, if I can not get consent to close the debate, I will move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in thirty minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PICKLER) there were—ayes 121, noes 2.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, it is alleged here that there are no politics in the appointment of these inspectors——

Mr. LOUD. Before the gentleman proceeds, I hope we can make some arrangement about the division of the time. Let us proceed intelligently.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I have the floor now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the objection, if the gentleman wants to make that arrangement.

Mr. LOUD. I simply want the time equitably divided between the two sides. I think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] probably should control the time, as he is on the committee, or the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], on that side.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be permitted to control the time on the side of my proposition.

Mr. LOUD. Then I ask that the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] be permitted to control the time on that side.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time on the affirmative of this proposition be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] and the time on the negative by the chairman of the committee [Mr. LOUD]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] to this letter. He says there is no politics in this. I especially desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee [Mr. LOUD] to the contents of this letter. It is from Mr. Beight, one of the men who was turned out of the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, charged with conspiracy concerning these inspectors:

DEAR SIR: I sincerely hope the House will defeat the proposition to increase the force of post-office inspectors. The service intended for the additional inspectors will be equally as reprehensible as that now performed by the secret agents—to inspect the letter-carrier service. Letter carriers are the sworn servants of the people. They each give bond in the sum of $1,000 for the faithful discharge of their duties. No system of espionage, however plausible, should ever obtain countenance in a government of freedom and equality.

If the correspondence connected with the present villainous "spy" system could be disclosed to the people of this country they would execrate the manipulators of it in language more forcible than elegant. I know something about it, and for the very reason that I could not sit silently at my desk in the free-delivery division and acquiesce in the iniquity of the scheme Mr. Jones dismissed me for "conspiracy to belittle the Department and to bring the officials into disrepute." I wrote to Mr. QUIGG last evening, and gave one notable instance of the work of the "spies," and this result was applauded by the officials in the Post-Office Department.

I want to call attention to this. This man seems to be a man of good standing, and he defies a refutation of what he states here. It seems to be worthy the attention of this House:

The statement I make is from the record, and can not be gainsaid. On the 15th of October, 1894, 81 additional carriers were appointed at the Philadelphia office. In less than two months thereafter a force of "special mechanics" (they were not known as secret agents then) were sent to that place to inspect the service (not to mend letter boxes), and upon the basis of their reports 100 letter carriers were reduced to the substitute roll, 78 at $1,000 and 22 at $800, thus showing that not a single carrier at $600 was touched. Was this an accident? Can it be possible that carriers in the service less than one year were more competent to serve the people of Philadelphia than those who had been in the service for years, and among them comrades in the war of the rebellion? This must be accepted as the crowning farce of the ingenious invention so skillfully operated by the present Superintendent of the Free-Delivery System in the Post-Office Department.

This system was inaugurated at Columbus, Ohio, September 15, 1894, notwithstanding the fact that the First Assistant Postmaster-General states in his published report, page 30, that the service was established February 1, 1895. I assert boldly, publicly and privately, without favor or fear of successful contradiction, that a score or more of the secret agents were ordered into the State of Ohio for partisan work in the election. That a forced contribution was levied for the Ohio campaign is conclusively shown by the letter of one of the agents addressed to his chief, Mr. William M. Bellman, Washington, D. C., from which the following is an extract: "Before I knew I was expected to contribute to the Ohio campaign fund I had made an investment at home which required all my spare money. This, together with its being held, made my funds run low." The statute forbidding the collection of money in a Government building for political purposes was openly violated in room 3, free delivery division, Post-Office Department. Either Mr. William M. Bellman and August W. Machen, employees in the Post-Office Department, should be dismissed from the public service and criminally prosecuted, or the three clerks dismissed on the 7th of last December on the charge of "conspiracy" should be locked up for malicious perjury.

Very truly, yours,

SAMUEL BEIGHT.

Hon. J. A. PICKLER, M. C., City.

Now, I ask the chairman of this committee if the perpetuation of this work—and I do it at the risk of the fourth or fifth assault upon me by the gentleman during the continuance of this debate—I ask the gentleman if this is the kind of inspectors and if this is the purpose for which he is trying so persistently to foist them upon this House?

Mr. MEREDITH. That would apply to John Wanamaker, would it not?

Mr. PICKLER. Wanamaker's administration for honesty, business purposes, and a good and progressive administration of the post-office service of the country has never been exceeded.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIGG. Does the gentleman on the other side desire to consume his whole fifteen minutes at once?

Mr. LOUD. I believe the gentleman has several waiting to speak. If he will use five minutes more, I will then proceed to use some of my time.

Mr. QUIGG. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, in the course of this debate several references have been made to the city of Philadelphia and to what has taken place there as to the result of the alleged work of these inspectors. The first statement that was made was that the force was reduced by the advcie of these inspectors nearly 100 letter carriers, and that the efficiency of the service was increased thereby. I wish to deny that statement right here; and following the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri that every one of the 70,000,000 of people in the United States are inspectors in regard to the efficiency of the service, I wish to deny emphatically of my own experience that the result of the judgment of these inspectors has been to improve the service in the city of Philadelphia.

I do not wish to drag any politics into this matter, for I believe that the routine of the business of the Department should rise above that. But facts are facts, and they are justified in being stated on the floor of this House; and I wish to state as a fact that, when that force was reduced in my district Republican letter carriers who had not a scratch against their names were discharged and Democratic carriers who had been suspended for inefficiency in their duties were kept in their places. Now, I say inspections that bring such results as that, to discharge good men and retain those whose records are against them, are not the sort of efficiency and inspection that are desirable.

The second point that I wish to make is that these men come from Washington, and over the heads of the local administration they are put on the track and trail of these carriers. It has been asked here over and over again, what is the difference between inspection and spying? What is the difference between legitimate and illegitimate business methods? I will tell you. If there are complaints of the conduct of any letter carrier, and those complaints are carried to the local postmaster, it is inspection for that local manager to send inspectors to find out what is the matter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE].

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire only to make a statement with reference to the matter presented by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], in which he attempts to throw some suspicion upon the Post-Office Department and its administration. The matter referred to in the letter from which he read, as I understand it, was a matter that was presented to the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads, and by that committee referred to a subcommittee composed of two Republicans and one Democrat, I being the Democrat, and after we had given these gentlemen who made the charge referred to in the letter a full, fair, and free hearing, when they were trying to impeach the administration of that office, it was the unanimous opinion of that subcommittee that there was nothing in these charges, and that we were not justified in permitting the subject to be pursued further, and so reported to the full committee who, as I remember, adopted the report with a single dissension.

These men, it is charged by the Department, entered into a conspiracy there. They had been discharged for irregularities in the performance of their respective duties, and then, as the Post-Office Department officials stated, they had conspired together for the purpose of throwing suspicion upon that office. They came forward with charges that levies had been made upon officials there for campaign purposes. The committee patiently heard what they had to say. After this investigation this committee came to the conclusion that the charges were untrue. After this these men disappeared, and nothing more was heard of them from that day until this, until the gentleman from South Dakota comes in with this matter, which was discredited by a committee of his own party and regarded by them as utterly unworthy of the consideration of this House. [Applause.]

I will say furthermore, Mr. Chairman, it was shown by documentary proof that is indisputable that one of these men who was charged with being in this conspiracy, and one of the parties presenting this matter, was a deserter from the Army. Another one of them had been caught purloining papers from the Department. I do not remember the charge that was brought against the other. But so poor a showing was made before that committee, notwithstanding it was a Republican committee, and these men claimed to be Republicans, seeking to impeach a Democratic administration, that the committee decided that there was nothing in these charges. That is all I have to say.

Mr. PICKLER. That man says you refused to hear him.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WOODMAN. Mr. Chairman, early in the session I introduced a bill or resolution relating to the Chicago post-office, referring to the fact that there were 60 men discharged last summer on the report of spies. I do not state whether they were Republicans or Democrats. There is an old maxim that has been laid down for a great many years by some of the ablest writers on law in England and in America, that where there is a wrong there should be a remedy. In this case there has been lots of wrong done, but no remedy anywhere to reinstate and assist these men who have been discharged while working in the post-office in any instance. I know of one case in particular which has been very aggravating. A man by the name of Ready, while going to a train, was "bridged" at Adams street, and he could not get over in time to catch the train. The train went away and when he crossed the bridge he met some friends, and during that period a row occurred, for which they were all arrested, and this man was taken in as a witness. He proved conclusively that he had done nothing, and was only used as a witness by the judge, and the transcript showed that fact. He was also discharged. There have been a number of men in Cook County discharged in the same way. Another man, named Cook, while doing his duty, was discharged for taking a drink of beer in a saloon. He was tried for that by the post-office authorities and discharged. Now, I think that is not a right and proper manner to dispose of this question, and therefore I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York and shall vote for it.

Mr. QUIGG. I have used eleven minutes, and the gentleman from California has ten.

Mr. LOUD. I will state to the gentleman that I propose to use that time myself. I believe it is the usual custom of the House to allow the chairman of the committee to close debate, and I shall yield no more time, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BELKNAP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas, in reply to my remarks, read extracts from a letter. I will only take a moment to beg the committee to note the fact that that letter reflects upon only 3 men out of 1,096 letter carriers in Chicago. The reflection cast upon the letter carriers of Chicago is uncalled for and unjust, and I beg to say that the men employed in that capacity in the city will do their duty well and will do it thoroughly, without spending the people's money for a system of spies to dog them from door to door. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, there is no longer a pretense, I hope, that there are no spies in this bill. Perhaps the gentleman from California will conclude the debate with an assurance that we have not been talking about anything; that we have been talking on a post-mortem subject; but the energy which gentlemen on the other side of the House—his associates in forcing these spies into the bill—have thrown into the debate ought certainly to make everyone on this side of the House understand it and know that Mr. Jones's spies are in the bill.

Now, gentlemen, what I propose to do by this amendment is to take them out. This bill as it stands provides a lump sum for salaries to be paid to post-office inspectors. With that portion of this lump sum which has been expended upon the inspectors that we have always had my amendment does nothing. It leaves them all in the bill, and the Post-Office Department from end to end of the country will have all the inspection that it ever has had and all it needs. My proposition is to take out of the bill the 30 new inspectors which are the continuation and perpetuation of the illegal force that has been employed by the First Assistant Postmaster-General. The question which I ask—and with this sentence I am content to conclude—the question which I ask every gentleman on the floor of the House to put to himself as he votes on this proposition, is whether he would not feel a little mean, a little humiliated, a little degraded, to be employing these emissaries of divorce-court lawyers in his business? If he would not, he may suitably vote for the bill as it stands; but if he thinks he would feel humiliated and degraded, and if he does not wish the Government of the United States to engage in any business that he would not engage in himself, he will support my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, no person realizes more than I do that this case has come into this body prejudged. I do not think there is a man on the floor to-day who has spoken on behalf of this amendment, I do not think there are more than ten gentlemen upon the floor who oppose this amendment, who had not made up their minds before the question was presented here. And talking of prejudging a case reminds me of what a member of this House said to me some days ago about this subsidy business. He said, "LOUD, so you are going to strike out all our Western subsidies on the lines running out to Chicago." I said, "My dear man, you never had any subsidy on lines running to Chicago." He said, "Is that a fact?" I said, "Yes; your trains have never received a dollar." Still that gentleman has persistently and consistently voted for the subsidy for this line running South, with the idea that the people in his own section of country were getting the benefit of it!

Coming back to the question before the committee, Mr. Chairman, I say that gentlemen have prejudged this case without investigating the facts at all. I think that I probably ought to have more than ten minutes to review this subject, and yet I am satisfied that ten minutes is more than sufficient, because the opinions of this Committee of the Whole are already formed. Mr. Chairman, as the author of this proposition I assume all the responsibility for it, because it was formed and framed in my own mind against the unanimous wish and against the unanimous protest of the officers of the Post-Office Department. I brought the matter before the subcommittee, and they, after an investigation of the whole subject, occupying some weeks, came to the conclusion that this was a proper and just provision to be incorporated in the bill. Gentlemen have been talking here all this afternoon about a system which is dead by this very bill. Permit me to say to you, gentlemen, that if we had brought this bill here in the form in which it has been brought on previous occasions, providing a lump sum of money for the support of the free-delivery service—and the Department estimated only $90,000 more than was appropriated for the current year—I say, if we had brought the bill to you in that form you would have passed it without a murmur, and this "spy" system that you now condemn would have gone on in full force.

The committee believed that that condition should not continue; but they also recognized the fact that there should be some provision made for supervision, not only over the carrier force, but over the whole post-office service. Now, I do not desire to dwell particularly upon what these "spies" have done. I condemn the system. It was wrong in its inception. It had no warrant of law, I believe, and the committee so concluded, and therefore they struck it out. But the Post-Office Department this year asks for only $90,000 above what was appropriated for the preceding year, and the increase in the carrier force has been, on an average, a million dollars for the last ten or fifteen years, which shows that the results, even of the work of that inspecting force, has been of great benefit to the people of this country. Gentlemen, all I can say in the few minutes I have remaining is that you who vote for the pending amendment are voting for a proposition with which you are not familiar. If I had the time, perhaps I could convince some of you, if I could get you to remain in your seats and listen. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. May I ask the gentleman a question for information upon this point?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is an appropriation here for an increase of post-office inspectors. Now, will the gentleman please state to us, who are endeavoring to ascertain what the facts are, what the necessity is for an increase of the amount appropriated for post-office inspectors over and above the amount appropriated last year?

Mr. LOUD. Permit me to say to the gentleman and to the members of this committee that there has been an average increase in this service of about $30,000 a year, and I repeat that if we had brought in a lump sum of money in this bill without segregation of items, and had offered to appropriate $332,000 in a lump sum you would have accepted it without a murmur.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LOUD. I have but four minutes left and I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. If I had time I should be glad to yield. I say again, Mr. Chairman, that if we had brought in the bill in that form this Committee of the Whole would have accepted it without a murmur. Now, we thought there should be some segregation of this service, because we believed the money could be more economically expended in that way. While our segregation would carry 50 additional inspectors, the increase of the amount is only $32,000, while the salaries of these men and their per diem would amount under the old system to $70,000. Now, there are 17,014 post-offices which these inspectors have to inspect. If a man could inspect one office a day, and on an average he can not do anything of the kind, still they would not inspect one-half the offices in a year. There is a demand for this force. That these men might be used to inspect the carrier routes also is possible, but not probable. The inspectors when they are sent out to inspect post-offices, the money-order division, or the registry division, or the accounts of postmasters, did at the same time perhaps inspect, to some extent, the carrier service.

Mr. Chairman, we make no provision for "spies." This service is to be continued under civil-service rules. Sir, the inspector force of the Post-Office Department is one of the best classes of officers in the country. It has the confidence of the American people. That it is beneficial and ought to be continued is recognized by everybody. In this bill we simply propose to appropriate $32,000 additional for post-office inspectors. They must remain under the control of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. I do not like to go into private details, but the First Assistant Postmaster-General has persistently fought this item from the start to the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I see my time is about to expire, and I will not undertake to continue the debate. I really ought to have had longer time in which to discuss this question. I hope I may be permitted to insert in my published remarks some data relating to the case referred to by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER]—data that properly came to the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. If that is to be done, let it be with the understanding——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD]?

Mr. QUIGG. We do not know about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to publish certain data with his remarks.

Mr. PICKLER. With the understanding that I can do the same thing on the other side——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. PICKLER. I do.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to insert the letter he has referred to.

Mr. PICKLER. If it is the understanding that both shall be inserted——

Mr. LOUD. I want the gentleman to have his matter inserted.

Mr. QUIGG. Let the letter to which the gentleman from California refers be read.

Mr. LOUD. Well, I will have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paper referred to in the time of the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. This paper shows the record of the man who brings these charges here.

The Clerk read as follows:

William Wallace Hill, late assistant superintendent of the free-delivery system, enlisted as a private in the United States Marine Corps at Philadelphia, Pa., on April 7, 1879, and was discharged at Washington, D. C., on March 16, 1880.

He was appointed clerk in the Census Office at a salary of $50 per month on December 21, 1880, which position he resigned on March 15, 1881. On March 15, 1881, he was appointed to the position of policeman on the Metropolitan police force of Washington, D. C. On August 17, 1881, he was tried for conduct unbecoming an officer of the police force and reprimanded by the major and superintendent. The misconduct consisted in this: That Private Hill, a married man, over the initials "V. A. R.," sent a note to a young lady, stating that he is "impressed with her charms," and suggesting a promenade.

On September 14, 1881, he was tried for neglect of duty and violation of the rules and regulations, found guilty, and fined $5. The violation consisted in absence from inspection of uniform clothing and absence from reserve duty.

On August 9, 1882, he was tried for gross neglect of duty, found guilty of not patroling his beat, and fined $5.

On January 3, 1883, he was tried for nonpayment of debt, and required to pay same.

On March 21, 1883, he was tried for violation of the rules, found guilty, and removed from the police force.

On January 24, 1884, he enlisted at Washington, D. C., as a second-class private in the United States Signal Corps, and was ordered to Fort Meyer, Va., for instructions. At the expiration of time allowed for instruction he was examined and failed to pass, and on July 9, 1884, he was recommended for discharge "as unfitted by reason of untrustworthiness and immoral habits to remain in the Signal Corps."

While at Fort Meyer, Va., Hill was detected in pawning Government property which had been stolen by other men and sharing in the proceeds.

On August 5, 1884, James B. Lambie, a merchant of Washington, D. C., called at the Signal Office and complained that on August 3 his mail had been stolen and that on August 4 this mail had been left at his store by Private W. W. Hill, who had tried at several banks to have a check cashed which was inclosed in one of the stolen letters addressed to Mr. Lambie, and that his (Lambie's) indorsement had been forged to the check. Hill was at once arrested by the military authorities at Fort Meyer, Va., and held in confinement on the charge of forgery. During the night of August 5, 1885, Hill contrived to make his escape from his guards, which he accomplished partly by deceiving them and partly by force. Hill remained a deserter at large until January 22, 1885, when he surrendered himself at Fort Meyer, Va., the Chief Signal Officer having on January 9 promised his (Hill's) mother to recommend "that he be dishonorably discharged without trial" if he would surrender himself. He was discharged from the Signal Corps without character on January 29, 1885.

On August 20, 1890, Hill was appointed, through the Civil Service Commission, a clerk at $600 per annum in the city post-office of Washington, D. C., which position he held until July 8, 1891, when he was transferred to the Post-Office Department at a salary of $900. On July 1, 1893, he was promoted to $1,000, and on August 16, 1893, was appointed assistant superintendent of the free-delivery service, from which he was removed on December 7, 1895, by the Postmaster-General for conspiring to injure certain officers and employees of the postal service and false statements in relation to the same and improperly giving out information in regard to public records and business.

On December 11, 1893, he was appointed special commissioner for the Court of Claims to investigate and report upon letter-carrier overtime claims, and shortly afterwards he was appointed to the position of special United States attorney by the Attorney-General.

That Hill has often perjured himself will be seen by an inspection of the public records. For example: In his application papers filed with the Civil Service Commission on Octobor 16, 1886, he said, under oath, that his occupation during the year 1884 was "clerk in National Republican office" of this city, while the records of the Signal Office show that from January to August 5 of that year he was at Fort Meyer, Va., and the remainder of that year he was in hiding as a deserter from the Signal Service, and that during this latter period he was advertised by the War Department as a deserter in the same National Republican newspaper where he claims he was employed as a clerk.

He also swears in said application that during the years 1882–83 he was on the Metropolitan police force, but had never been in the military or naval service, except in the Marine Corps during the years 1870-1880, and that he had voluntarily resigned all the positions he had held from 1881 to 1886, and had never been removed or discharged from any of them, while the records of the Signal Office show that he was in that service during the year 1884, and was discharged for cause. Also, the records of the Metropolitan police force show that he was discharged from the service for cause.

He also swears in said application that his bona fide legal residence is in Washington, D. C., and that he was born July 7, 1858, at Okolona, Miss., while in another application filed with the Civil Service Commission on May 22, 1891, he swears that his bona fide legal residence is the State of Mississippi and has been from his birth.

In his application for enlistment in the Marine Corps on April 17, 1879, he gave his age as 22 years and the place of his birth Urbana, Ohio, at which time he was only 20 years 9 months and 10 days of age if his statements to the Civil Service Commission are true.

In his application for the position of policeman on March 15, 1881, he gave his age as 26, and place of birth, Urbana, Ohio. At this date he was only 21 years 7 months 11 days, if, as he swears, he was born on July 7, 1858.

The records of the Pension Office show that as W. Wallace Hill he has been engaged in filing and prosecuting pension claims, and has received pay for same, since he came into the postal service, in direct violation of section 5498, United States Revised Statutes.

About February, 1890, Hill made application for a civil-service examination for a position in the city post-office, upon which application and examination he was afterwards appointed to a place in said office on August 20, 1890. All applications for entrance to the civil service are numbered consecutively, and the numbers on either side of the Hill papers are found in their proper place, but the Hill papers are missing.

Mr. PICKLER (during the reading of the foregoing). I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How does this come in?

The CHAIRMAN. This is being read in the time of the gentleman from California, which has not expired.

The reading having been concluded,

The CHAIRMAN. The time limited for debate on this question has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], which will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 4 and 5, page 11, after the word "clerks," strike out "two hundred and twelve" and insert "one hundred and seventy-six," so as to make the amount of the appropriation $176,093.66.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to, there being—ayes 162, noes 63.

The Clerk read as follows:

For per diem allowance to inspectors in the field while actually traveling on business of the Department, at the rate of $3 per day (exclusive of Sundays, except in cases of emergency), $90,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. I raise a point of order that this provision is contrary to existing law. The existing law allows $4 per diem; this paragraph allows but $3 per diem.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, this paragraph simply limits the appropriation to $3 a day; it does not undertake to change the law with respect to the per diem allowance. These inspectors, notwithstanding this provision, might still recover at law the amount of their compensation unappropriated. The Chair thinks the point of order not well taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend by striking out in this paragraph the words "of $3 per day (exclusive of Sundays, except in cases of emergency), $90,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$120,000."

Mr. Chairman, the Revised Statutes (edition of 1874–1881, page 467) provide that—

Post-office inspectors shall be allowed $4 per day in lieu of the charges now permitted for personal expenses.

This bill as reported provides an appropriation of $90,000, which, I assume, is based upon a per diem of $3; so I have in my amendment fixed the amount of the appropriation at one-third more—$120,000.

Sir, it seems to me that it is shortsighted to cut down the per diem of these inspectors. Prior to the law which I have just read the statute provided that they should be allowed their actual expenses, not exceeding $5 a day. While that law was in existence the actual expenses of these inspectors, for which vouchers were in all cases produced, exceeded $4 per day.

No single arm of the service, I believe, is more important than the inspection of post-offices; and, so far as my experience goes, these inspectors are specially valuable and specially serviceable to the Department. In fact they are indispensable to the welfare of the service. They are a class of men, many of them, that I am surprised the Government is able to induce to accept the employment at the limit of salary of $1,600 a year, which is the maximum sum allowed.

It is impossible for the inspectors, in some cases which have come within my own knowledge, to pay their expenses with the present per diem of $4 even. It would be utterly impossible in a majority of cases for these inspectors to live, as men engaged in such an occupation ought to live, and carry on the business of the Department intrusted to them as it should be carried on, on the allowance of $3 per day as the bill proposes. Out of this allowance must be paid every possible expenditure involved in the work intrusted to them, excepting alone livery hire. The items for hotel bills, sleeping-car fare, and everything of that kind, must be paid by themselves, and every man here knows that it is impossible to ride a single night on a sleeping car without paying at least $2 for it, and I presume no United States official is mean enough to deprive the porter of his quarter. So three-fourths of the per diem allowance is used up when one of these inspectors has to go on a journey, say from New York to Pittsburg, and occupy a sleeping car at night. Within my own knowledge an inspector was sent on special service from New Jersey to do some work at Denver, under instructions from the Postmaster-General, and in that trip, occupying less than three weeks, his expenses over and above the per diem allowed him were something over $50.

Now, on the meager salary allowed these men—for it must be remembered that the maximum salary is only $1,600, and some of them get lower salaries—it is unfair and unjust to expect a good official to pay his actual expenses. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is utterly ridiculous to attempt to cut down this per diem and at the same time expect to have efficient service in the future. Moreover, there can be no doubt, under the law, if the appropriation bill fixes the compensation at $3 per diem, and that is not accepted by the inspector, he can collect the difference between three and four dollars a day by law, the $4 being the statutory limit.

In all justice and fairness I think the amendment changing the amount fixed in the bill from $3 to $4 ought to be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I only wanted to suggest to the gentleman from New York that in rendering their returns to the Department these men must submit every item of expenditure.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is correct; every item.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]. I think I hear a familiar voice which says "Vote!" "Vote!" and I think also that that voice has detained the House even more than the chairman of the committee has detained it in the consideration of the bill.

Now, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from New York who offered this amendment for a few moments. He is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I would not undertake to controvert his judgment on an item in the bill reported by him from his committee, because I know his judgment is better than mine in matters relating to the Indians. I know nothing of the Indian appropriation bill, but I do happen to know something of the bill we are now considering.

You have cut down the appropriation for post-office inspectors in the bill below what we now have, and permit me to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], with all due respect to his mathematical ability, that his amendment will have the effect of cutting off at least ten of these men now employed under the present system.

This bill provides $3 a day for the expenses of 104 men. During the last year there was expended but $80,000 under the old allowance per diem. This bill carries $90,000, and you propose to increase the per-diem rate to $4 per day, when, as a matter of fact, but $75,000 can be used for the service.

Now, in all fairness the chairman of the committee bringing in an appropriation bill, through courtesy at least, ought to be consulted if any gentleman on the floor thinks he wants to add something material to the bill. Gentlemen, permit me to say to you to-day that you are dealing with things of which you have no knowledge whatever.

Mr. RAY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, we have some intelligence.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman consent to changing the word "three" to "four," and leave the appropriation at $90,000?

Mr. LOUD. No; and if you will give me the time I will explain to you why. [Cries of "Go on!"] There is not an item in this bill that we have not given careful consideration to. I will explain to you the true condition. There is not an inspector in the service to-day but wants to get $4 a day; but here is the condition: Two-thirds of this inspector force are engaged in regular post-office inspection, inspecting post-offices in the country towns. More than two-thirds of their time is spent there. All of the poorer class of inspectors are engaged in this work. The better inspectors are employed exclusively in the depredation cases in the larger cities. Now, your poorer inspector being engaged in this work of supervision, of examining the accounts of the post-offices throughout the country, the expenses of that man will not exceed $2 per day in any instance, because his transportation is provided for. That man, as the result of the present condition, saves $2 per day out of his per diem, and as a further result your poorer man gets a salary of $2,200 a year, while your better man has expenses which run up to six, seven, eight, and ten dollars a day. If an inspector has pride in his work, if he wants to make a record, if he is a good inspector, he will oftentimes spend beyond the $4 a day, and in every case must expend at least $4 a day, because he is employed in the more delicate work around the cities.

Mr. LACEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LOUD. If I may have time to answer it.

Mr. LACEY. Do not the better inspectors get $2,500 a year?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; none of them get that.

Mr. LOUD. Every inspector gets the same—that is, those who receive per diem—excepting during his probationary period.

Mr. LACEY. Are there not nine who get that?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; superintendents; but I was talking of inspectors. We have taken the dollar that has been deducted from the per diem and we have put the larger portion of that money into a special fund under the discretion of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, that he might make allowances in these special cases. I know where inspectors have expended as much as $25 in one single instance to make a present to a person, if you please, to detect a thief. There is no way under the present law by which that man can be reimbursed. The system that we have formulated here, I think, tends to equalize it, at least so far as we can, to the better men in the service so they would get $1,600 a year under this proposed amendment, and the poorer men would still get more. That is the result of this.

Gentlemen, the results of the labors of this committee are presented to you, and of course you can do with them as you see fit. I know an inspector wants all he can get. I know if a man has been getting $4 per day as a per diem he accepts that as a vested right. He thinks he is entitled to that $4 per day, notwithstanding he may have been saving $2 of that for years.

This is a plain business proposition which the Depatrment itself ought to accept. If you do not want to accept it, you need not, of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. In view of the observations of the gentleman from California, I prefer that the amendment should read in the following form.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his amendment. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "three," in line 14, page 11, after the word "of," and insert "four."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is in lieu of my former amendment. It does not change the total which my friend from California [Mr. LOUD] says is sufficient, and complies with the law as it exists—makes the compensation $4 per day.

Mr. LOUD. Permit me to say that amendment destroys the whole bill. You have destroyed it partially, so far as this system is concerned. We have carried in another item $13,000 that was taken from this item that we thought could be used for the bettering of the service. Now, I do not think you want to increase the appropriation. If you want to pay these men $4 a day and still insist upon this other item, of course you can do it; but the gentleman himself must acknowledge that he is destroying entirely the continuity of this bill by his amendment. I hope the House will vote it down.

The question being taken on the amendment, the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LOUD) there were—ayes 50, noes 87.

Mr. SHERMAN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Nineteen gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental expenses, including prosecution of official investigations, office rent, telegrams, etc., $13,000.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out the last word. I desire, in return for the uniform courtesy of the chairman of the committee, to withdraw the objection I made to the publication of the letter. I think it was not read in full during his time. I desire to withdraw the objection to that, and let it go into the RECORD. I only want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the writer of the letter that I had read was Mr. Beight. Now, Mr. Beight recites facts, and he defies any dispute of them; and I understand he is a man of character. The gentleman has put in a letter here written by a Mr. Hill.

Mr. LOUD. It is the same case.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know who Mr. Hill is, but I have looked over the letter, and I find while on the police force here years ago he was occasionally fined $5 for indiscretion, and since that time he has been assistant United States attorney, and has been a clerk in the Census Office—receiving $1,000 a year, I think, in the Post-Office Department. He was one of the men who were said to have been engaged in this conspiracy. Now, Mr. Beight—that is the gentleman who wrote this letter to me—has called me out since the letter was read, and said to me that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads invited them to come before them. He said that they treated them very courteously, and the chairman of the Post-Office Committee said that the reason they did not investigate the matter was because they had no power, and unless a resolution was introduced and passed by the House for an investigation the committee could not go into it. And he further says that if the House will take that action and investigate that matter he will furnish telegrams and all the evidence to substantiate the statement that this was a political move; that these men were sent into Ohio for a political purpose, and that political assessments were made on them. Now, talking about Mr. Hill, I only know this other man. I know nothing about Mr. Hill. But the point is, will the gentleman from California, the chairman of the committee, deny the fact that Beight recites?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. PICKLER. I always yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say that the committee did hear these gentlemen. The matter was before the committee and was referred to the subcommittee. The subcommittee unanimously reported to the committee that they did not think the charges presented to the committee were worthy of consideration. The committee then unanimously adopted the report of the subcommittee. These gentlemen have had many months in which to present their case to Congress. They have allowed a year and a half to go over. There is nothing in it.

Mr. PICKLER. But is it not a fact that your committee refused to go into the investigation because you said you had no power to do so?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, we heard them as far as they wished to be heard.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman answer the question? Did you not say that you could not go further without there was a resolution of the House ordering an investigation? Did you not say that?

Mr. LOUD. We said we could not enter into a regular investigation, to send for books and papers, without the authority of this House; but we recommended against that course.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir; you did not want any resolution of investigation.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well, you have had power to introduce it, and you can introduce it, if you want to father that case.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the allowance to post-office inspectors (excepting those receiving salaries of $2,500 per annum) of such items of actual and necessary personal expense, incurred in the discharge of their official duties, as may be in excess of the per diem of $3 allowed by law, upon presentation and approval of vouchers covering the total expenditure for personal expenses for the dates for which such excess may be claimed; or, if the exigencies of the service render the taking of vouchers impracticable or inexpedient, the sworn statement of the inspector, reciting the objects, amounts of, and necessity for such expenditures, may be accepted in lieu of vouchers, $17,000; in all, $332,093.66.

Mr. LOUD. That total ought to be corrected.

Mr. QUIGG. I ask the gentleman from California if he will accept an amendment there making the total $296,000?

Mr. LOUD. You have the figures there before you, and I would rather you should offer the amendment.

Mr. QUIGG. I move to amend by striking out "three hundred and thirty-two," in line 6, page 12, and inserting the words "two hundred and ninety-six."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, line 6, strike out the words "three hundred and thirty-two" and insert the words "two hundred and ninety-six"; so as to read "$296,093.66."

Mr. LOUD. Did you not strike off the odd dollars and cents?

Mr. QUIGG. No, sir; my amendment simply takes out the $36,000.

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman, however, that that reduces the amount below that carried for the current year.

Mr. QUIGG. My amendment takes out 30 inspectors, at $1,200, which is the lowest sum contemplated by the gentleman's plan.

Mr. LOUD. I am satisfied that the Senate will correct this matter, and I am willing to let it go.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolutions:

Concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver, from the number now in his care, one copy of the compilated statutes in force in the District of Columbia to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, for his personal use, and 500 copies to the superintendent of documents for distribution to depositories of public documents: Provided, That the remaining copies of the work may be sold at $2.50 per copy.

Concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to print the reports, correspondence, charts, maps, and other documents now on file in the Treasury Department or other branches of the Government, relating to the fur seal, salmon fisheries, and other matters pertaining to the Territory of Alaska; 3,000 copies to be printed, of which 750 shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 750 copies for the use of the Treasury Department and other Departments whose reports are thus printed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, and I would like to have it read and then to be permitted to make a brief explanation before objection is made, if any gentleman desires to object to it.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 3, line 12, insert, after the words "in all," "for free-delivery service, including existing experimental free delivery in towns where such service has shown a profit during the past year."

Mr. LOUD. I reserve the point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I was absent in committee when this bill was first taken up, and I was not present when this item was reached. There is a town in my district which was included among the 46 experimental stations in the United States, and which, I am informed by the postmaster, has shown a handsome profit upon its free-delivery system. Now, it seems to me that no gentleman in this House can object to the continuance of the experimental service as it has existed for the last year in such towns as have shown a profit. I believe that what we want nowadays is revenue, and it seems to me that it is merely a reasonable request to ask that these towns which have shown a profit may be allowed to continue their free delivery. I have a list here of 24 towns, which, if it is the desire of members, I will read, showing the places that have made a profit. As to this town in my own district, I am informed on the best authority—that of the postmaster himself—that it has made a profit. I ask unanimous consent to offer this amendment, and I trust the gentleman in charge of this bill will not object to it.

Mr. LOUD. I object, Mr. Chairman. I now ask unanimous consent to strike out the numbers of the paragraphs in the bill, as they were inserted merely for convenience.

Mr. HILL. I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike them out.

The motion was agreed to; and the numbers were struck out.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, there is one amendment upon which I should like to take the sense of the House separately. It is on page 2 of the bill, the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I think members must now be satisfied that it can accomplish nothing and that its only effect in the bill will be to mystify and to curtail the allowance for this purpose, and I hope it will be struck out.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote asked upon any other amendment?

There was no response.

The remaining amendments were then adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment upon which the gentleman from California asks a separate vote.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 2, page 2, after the word "dollars," the following: "Six hundred thousand dollars of which shall be available and may be used in payment of clerk hire in third and fourth class separating post-offices."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman what amendment this is? Is it the one adopted on motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]?

Mr. LOUD. It is. It can accomplish nothing and ought to be stricken out.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, the gentleman from Iowa is absent now, and that amendment was adopted by a pretty full vote of the committee, and it seems to me——

Mr. LOUD. I know; but the amendment can accomplish nothing, and I hope the House will strike it out.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 57; so the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out all the words in lines 14 to 22, both inclusive, on page 8.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CRISP. That the proposition which the gentleman proposes to strike out has been passed upon by the committee. That express question was voted upon by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not know about that. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROMWELL. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the language that is proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Page 8, beginning with line 14, strike out the following:

"Twenty-seven and one-half. For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Boston, Mass., by way of New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans, $196,614.22: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service."

The yeas and nays were ordered, 46 members voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 136, not voting 109; as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Michigan with Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. BAILEY (having voted in the affirmative). Mr. Speaker, I have agreed to pair on this question with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PRICE], who is confined at his home by sickness. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. DINSMORE. I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLARKE]. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I should vote "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask whether this matter which has been debated can be further amended. Can anything more be done with it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer to answer that question when some gentleman attempts something. [Laughter.]

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. BARTHOLDT, for six days, on account of sickness.
To Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina, for six days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (S. 1825) to incorporate the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington; when the Speaker signed the same.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 12, 1896.

Prayer by Rev. WALLACE RADCLIFFE, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation of $3,130 for setting up and operating two portable steam sawmills on the Nez Perce Indian Reservation, Idaho, including transportation of mill machinery from the agency to the mill sites, as submitted by the Secretary of the Interior on the 10th instant as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter of the 4th instant, from N. L. Jeffries, attorney for the North American Commercial Company, lessees of the islands of St. Paul and St. George, Alaska, remonstrating against the proposition to destroy fur seals by order of the United States, as contemplated by House bill No. 3206, which recently passed the House of Representatives; which, with the accompanying letter, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of Mary E. Cartland, president, and sundry other members of the White Ribbon Society of North Carolina, praying for the appointment of an international arbitration commission between the United States and Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Okolona, Miss., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FAULKNER (for Mr. SMITH) presented the memorial of William B. Graves and 24 other physicians of Essex County, N. J., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the further prevention of cruelty to animals in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition numerously signed by citizens of Athens, Tenn., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of E. G. Parker Post, No. 99, Department of Maine, Grand Army of the Republic, praying that a service pension of $8 a month be granted to all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines of the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Merchant Tailors' National Exchange, praying for the formation of the international peace society; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the American Purity Alliance of New York, praying for the establishment of a national commission to investigate the subject of social vice; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of R. E. L. Graham and 30 other citizens of Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of the committee for philanthropic labor of the Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends, remonstrating against the introduction of military drill in the public schools of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of the University of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Ohio Intercollegiate Oratorical Association of Granville, Ohio, praying for the establishment of an international board of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have in my hand a petition from the White Ribbon women. It is a petition in behalf of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Hampshire, representing 2,800 women, advocating the settlement of differences between the United States and the mother country by arbitration. The petition is very brief, and it will be gratifying to me to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, White Ribbon women, who wear the badge of peace and represent the home, the church, the school, and the philanthropies that seek to enthrone the golden rule of Christ, that by its means we may help to bring in the golden age of man, hereby earnestly petition your honorable body to adopt a resolution, and appoint a commission to carry out the provisions of the same, whereby all subjects of difference between the United States and our mother country shall be referred to arbitration.

We rejoice that the legislature of the great Empire State of New York, with but one dissenting voice, petitioned you to take the same beneficent action, and we believe that every legislature in the land would gladly do the same. She who bears the soldier begs that he need no longer bear the sword, but that instead the keen blade of justice and the ammunition of cogent argument may be the only weapons used between two great nations so closely akin by reason of their common ancestry and religion, their common language and history, and their common love and loyalty to the home, which is the bright consummate flower of a Christian civilization.

To this end we appeal to you with great good will and entire confidence that our prayer to God and our plea to you will not prove to be in vain.

In behalf of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Hampshire, representing 2,800 women.

MISS C. R. WENDELL, President.
MISS C. N. BROWN,
Corresponding Secretary.

Mr. McMILLAN presented sundry petitions of citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1886, or some similar measure, requiring the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to adopt rapid transit on its lines, and remonstrating against the extension of the tracks of that company until its existing lines are modernly equipped and operated; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALTHALL presented the petition of P. K. Mayers, of Scranton, Miss., praying for the enactment of legislation to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the construction of a bridge across the Detroit River; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Minnesota Forestry Association, praying for the enactment of legislation extending our forest reserves; which was referred to the Select Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented the memorial of Peter H. Christenson and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of Christian Johnson and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of Peter A. Hanson and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of R. W. Croskrey and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of Hans Jansen and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of George McCrady and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of F. E. Run and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of J. H. Behrens and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of V. G. Bryant and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of Joseph Johnson and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of M. B. Van Kirk and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of G. G. Mattson and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of W. J. Newton and sundry other citizens of Minnesota; the memorial of Josiah Wood and sundry other citizens of Minnesota, and the memorial of Louis Anderson and sundry other citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of Seth F. Chambers and 30 other citizens of Cold Spring, N. J., and a petition of Cold Spring Council, No. 135, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Cold Spring, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. VEST presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Enrolled Missouri Militia, held at Gallatin, Mo., March 7, 1896, favoring the enactment of a general pension law granting a pension of $8 per month to all soldiers of the late war, including the Enrolled Missouri Militia, and all who were in the six months' service who served ninety days and were honorably discharged, and also to the widows and orphans of such as may be deceased; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of S. Anderson, of Talley Cavey, Pa., and a petition of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DANIEL presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Norfolk, Va., remonstrating against a change in the laws affecting the present pilot system; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of W. P. Respess, E. L. Crockett, W. F. Doran, and sundry other citizens of Virginia, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of Randolph-Macon College, Ashland, Va., praying for the establishment of a permanent board of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of James Wilson, Timothy Casey, John Moriarty, and Thomas F. Stanford, of Danville, Va., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1600, to amend chapter 67, volume 23, of the Statutes at Large of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 805) to provide for the rank, pay, and emoluments of retired officers of the United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1980) for a relief light vessel on the Pacific Coast, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WOLCOTT, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2027) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1893, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ELKINS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 314) for the relief of Eunice Tripler, widow of Charles S. Tripler, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. TELLER on the 11th instant intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, reported it with amendments, and moved that it be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, to whom were referred the following petitions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to:

A petition of the Board of Trade of Stillwater, Minn., praying that an appropriation be made for the protection of the harbor and lake fronts of said city; and

A petition of sundry citizens of South Sioux City, Nebr., praying that a special appropriation be made to protect encroachment of the Missouri River.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 328) for the relief of Richard S. Taylor, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1598) for the relief of Richard L. Taylor, late private Company F, Fifty-first Illinois Volunteers, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3462) to regulate the business of storage in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. TELLER on the 4th instant concerning the issue of rations and supplies to all Southern Ute Indians to whom lands have been allotted, etc., intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, reported it with amendments, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that it be printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 11th instant concerning the claim of the Fond du Lac band of Chippewa Indians, of Lake Superior, intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, reported it favorably, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6936) for the reconstruction of the Rock Island Bridge, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 434) for the relief of William F. Wilson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 307) for the relief of Richard H. Marsh, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill (S. 2324) to relieve John McCarthy from the charge of desertion was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee asks to be excused from its further consideration, and that it be sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It pertains to service in the Navy.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1499) to correct the muster of Lieut. Gilman L. Johnson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2035) granting a pension to Julia D. Richardson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 2d instant intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported it with amendments, and moved that it be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

GAS BUOYS IN THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2114) establishing gas buoys in the St. Lawrence River, to report it favorably with an amendment.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up for present consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to establish gas buoys at or near the following-named places in the St. Lawrence River: One at Charity Shoals, one at Featherbed Shoals, one at Rock Island Point, one near the Sisters Island Light, one at Sunken Rock, one at Bay State Shoals, and one at the Lower Narrows.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which has just been read.

Mr. MILLS. Is it a measure reported from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. HILL. It is just reported.

Mr. FRYE. It is a bill to which I think there can be no possible objection. It is recommended by the Light-House Board.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection to it. I merely wanted to know if it had been reported.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in the last line of the bill, to strike out the word "and" where it first appears, and after the word "Narrows" to insert "and one at entrance upper harbor Ogdensburg."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT STREET RAILWAY FRANCHISES.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back favorably the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives referred to that committee day before yesterday, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it be now considered. It is a resolution of a single paragraph.

The concurrent resolution was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound into one convenient volume, at the Government Printing Office, all the various acts of Congress relating to street-railway franchises in the District of Columbia; and that 200 copies of the same shall be furnished for the use of the Senate, 400 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,500 copies for the use of and distribution by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. There is now on the Calendar the joint resolution (S. R. 14) to compile and publish the laws relating to street-railway franchises in the District of Columbia, which was reported a month ago. I move that the joint resolution be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF BULLETIN ON APICULTURE.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 15,000 copies of the bulletin on apiculture, to report it back and move concurrence in the House amendments.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were read and concurred in, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 9, 1896.

Resolved, That the foregoing concurrent resolution of the Senate "providing for the printing of 15,000 copies of the bulletin on apiculture" do pass, with the following amendments:

Line 2, strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty."

Line 6, strike out "and."

Line 7, after the word "Senate," insert "and 5,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture."

Amend the title so as to read: "Providing for the printing of 20,000 copies of the bulletin of apiculture."

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 72) directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to report it favorably and move that it be concurred in.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 3 of the title, to strike out "20" and insert "10"; so as to make the title read: "A joint resolution directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 10 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

The amendment was concurred in.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. HALE presented a report of operations by Col. John M. Wilson, Corps of Engineers, upon repairs and enlargement of the Government Printing Office and the erection of a fireproof building upon the site of the Government Printing Office stables under the Chief of Engineers during the month of February, 1896; which was ordered to be printed.

HARBOR AT CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 133) directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for necessary repairs at Cleveland Harbor, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 95) directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for necessary repairs at Cleveland Harbor, reported adversely thereon; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

OBSOLETE CANNON BALLS.

Mr. PALMER. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (S. 611) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Michigan Soldiers' Home, and the bill (S. 745) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to the New Hampshire Soldiers' Home, to report them back with a substitute which has the effect of a general law for both the bills. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to the fact that in the opinion of the Chief of Ordnance the proposed general law that I report as a substitute will serve the purposes of both these bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. I inquire of the Senator from Illinois if I understood him correctly to state that a general law has been reported covering this matter?

Mr. PALMER. It is now reported with these bills. The Chief of Ordnance furnished the draft of a bill which in his judgment covers not only these two bills, but all others of like character.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am gratified to know that fact. I think it is a proper measure.

The bill (S. 2489) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver obsolete or unserviceable cannon balls to any of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was read twice by its title.

Mr. PALMER. There is a law now which authorizes the delivery of condemned cannon to all these homes. Application has been made for obsolete cannon balls by the homes, to be used for mere ornamental purposes. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver such cannon balls. The existing law provides for the delivery of condemned cannon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that unfortunately this bill will not reach the home that I have in mind. It is a State home.

Mr. PALMER. The bill provides also for State homes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The title does not so indicate. I hope it does.

Mr. HALE. Let me state that the Senate has already passed a bill authorizing both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to give or loan condemned cannon or cannon balls to any of these homes, and to soldiers' monument associations, and to municipalities. That bill is now before the House. It can do no harm to pass this measure, too, but it will not perhaps be needed.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Secretary to read the communication from General Flagler, which will furnish all the information that is in my possession? It will be found among the papers accompanying the bill.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the bill at all.

Mr. PALMER. I desire that it shall be understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bills 611 and 745, donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Michigan and New Hampshire Soldiers' Homes, with report that there is already on the statute books a general law that authorizes the issue of two obsolete guns to the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and also to the State homes for soldiers and sailors (volume 25, page 657, Statutes at Large). So that, so far as the cannon are concerned, these bills are unnecessary.

But these bills provide for the issue of 100 cannon balls, and the general law mentioned above does not provide for the issue of any cannon balls.

The cannon balls are on hand and can be supplied, if Congress authorizes the issue. To accomplish this it would be necessary that these two bills should be enacted into law, and the portions of the bills relating to the guns, being unnecessary, should be stricken out. As it is equally desirable, however, that all the other national and State homes should receive cannon balls, as proposed in these bills, I submit and recommend for favorable action the following draft of a bill which will accomplish this purpose, and recommend that it be substituted for Senate bills 611 and 745, viz:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized and directed, subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, to deliver to any of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers already established or hereafter established, and to any of the State homes for soldiers and sailors, or either, now or hereafter duly established and maintained under State authority, such obsolete or unserviceable cannon balls as may be on hand undisposed of, not exceeding 100 to any one home, for ornamental purposes."

Very respectfully,
D. W. FLAGLER,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. PALMER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver obsolete or unserviceable cannon balls to any of the National or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the two bills reported by the Senator from Illinois.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2490) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a national park at Gettysburg, Pa.," approved on the 11th day of February, 1895; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 2491) to increase the pension of Louisa E. Baylor, widow of Thomas G. Baylor, late a colonel of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 2492) authorizing the purchase of a site for a building for the accommodation of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 2493) granting an increase of pension to Albert Flanders; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2494) restoring a pension to Michael Carron; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2495) restoring a pension to Oliver R. Goodwin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2496) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James B. Jordan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2497) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to adjudicate a claim of the heirs of John Bowling, deceased, and to remove the bar of the statute of limitations therefrom; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2498) to permit the Home Telephone Company of Washington, D. C., to install, maintain, and operate a telephone and telegraph plant and exchange in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2499) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Great Falls Electric Railway Company"; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2500) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Charles T. Hurd, formerly a landsman in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WALTHALL introduced a bill (S. 2501) for the relief of James Sims, of Marshall County, Miss.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 2502) making appropriation for the purpose of grading, graveling, and guttering Rhode Island avenue from Fourth street NE. to Twelfth street NE.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2503) for the relief of Addison A. Hosmer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a bill (S. 2504) to incorporate the Maritime Canal of North America, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NELSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 98) directing the Secretary of War to submit a plan and estimates for the repairs and maintenance of the harbor at Stillwater, Minn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I introduce a joint resolution which I ask may be read by title and referred to the Committee on Commerce. If the Senate will allow me one word before introducing the joint resolution, I will state that it is a joint resolution proposing that not exceeding $20,000 of the money heretofore appropriated for the construction of the canals and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia be used for the purpose of erecting necessary protecting walls not technically included in the contract and which are absolutely necessary in order that that great work can be opened to traffic immediately. I make the request of the committee that the joint resolution be submitted to the War Department for report.

Mr. FRYE. Does the joint resolution provide that the consent of the contractors shall be obtained?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It does.

The joint resolution (S. R. 99) authorizing the immediate use of a portion of the unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for construction of canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River in construction of protecting walls necessary to the opening of said canal and locks to navigation was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KYLE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON THE VIRGINIUS CASE.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Executive Document B of the special session of the Senate, being a message of the President of the United States, of March 15, 1875, in relation to the Virginius case, be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

CLAIMS FOR BARRACKS AND QUARTERS.

Mr. LINDSAY. I submit a resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to reexamine Treasury settlements Nos. 9695, 159, and 9660, being claims for barracks and quarters certified to Congress for appropriations in House Document No. 234, Fifty-third Congress, third session, for the payment of which no appropriations have been made; and if found correct to report the same to Congress at as early a day as practicable at the present session.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. This is an original resolution, I understand?

Mr. LINDSAY. It is.

Mr. PLATT. I think it has been customary where a claim has once been acted upon and reported to Congress to ask that it be reexamined.

Mr. LINDSAY. These claims have been acted upon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That has been the rule. I wanted to know if this came within the rule; that is all.

The resolution was agreed to.

CALUMET RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave out of order, in view of the fact that I am compelled to attend the Committee on Appropriations, to call up the bill (S. 2251) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Illinois will allow the order of resolutions to be called. There is a resolution on the table which I should like to have acted upon. I do not think it will take any time.

Mr. CULLOM. This bill will take no longer time than the reading of it. I hope it will be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE WASHINGTON GAS LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the consideration of the resolution submitted by me a few days ago and which comes over from yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Florida, coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CALL on the 9th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, directed to obtain from the Washington Gas Light Company and report to the Senate a statement under oath showing the amount of cash on hand on the 1st day of January, 1895, including money on deposit in banks and elsewhere; also a statement of the money received from consumers of gas; also how much money received from other sources; each to be given separately; also the disbursements of money, and for what purpose; also the amount of money at the close of business on the 31st of December, 1895, including money in bank and elsewhere.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. What is the resolution?

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the resolution was introduced by request of a large number of persons in the District here who are interested in the subject of the gas lighting of the District and the new proposals for improving the lighting here.

Mr. HARRIS. It simply asks for information.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read. Was it reported from a committee?

Mr. CULLOM. It was not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following:

And also to report to the Senate such further facts in regard to the management of the business of supplying the citizens of Washington with gas and the price thereof as they may deem material for action by the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I accept that amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest another amendment, to be put either in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts or in the original resolution of the Senator from Florida, by inserting "and also the prices paid for coal."

Mr. HOAR. That is "material" and would be included in the amendment I have offered; but I have no objection to it, and accept it.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be modified as indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be read from the desk as it now stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution:

And also to report to the Senate such further facts in regard to the management of the business of supplying the citizens of Washington with gas and the price thereof as they may deem material for action by the Senate, and also the prices paid for coal.

Mr. HOAR. The words "and also the prices paid for coal" should come in before the words "as they may deem material." I suggest that there be also inserted "and the illuminating power of the gas so furnished."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have the entire resolution read as it will read with the modifications which have been made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, directed to obtain from the Washington Gas Light Company and report to the Senate a statement under oath showing the amount of cash on hand on the 1st day of January, 1895, including money on deposit in banks and elsewhere; also a statement of the money received from consumers of gas; also how much money received from other sources; each to be given separately; also the disbursements of money, and for what purpose; also the amount of money at the close of business on the 31st of December, 1895, including money in bank and elsewhere; and also to report to the Senate such further facts in regard to the management of the business of supplying the citizens of Washington with gas, also the price thereof, also the prices paid for coal, and also the illuminating power of the gas so furnished, as they may deem material for action by the Senate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suggest that this resolution had better be printed and go over until to-morrow. If it is intended to cover an investigation as to all the materials used in the production of gas, the illuminating power, etc., I should not think the resolutions drastic enough to accomplish the purpose.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to that suggestion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the resolution should go over.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My only desire is to help to perfect it; that is all.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to the resolution going over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3265) donating condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to Stone River Post, No. 74, Grand Army of the Republic, Sedan, Kans.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 818) for the relief of Halvor K. Omlie, of Homen, N. Dak.; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 47) relating to the Federal census.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 900) to provide for the payment of the claim of William H. Mahoney;

A bill (H. R. 2290) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the State of South Dakota;

A bill (H. R. 5229) for the relief of George H. Lott;

A bill (H. R. 5979) for the right of the Rock Island, Muscatine and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Illinois and Mississippi Canal;

A bill (H. R. 6304) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at Knoxville, Tenn.;

A bill (H. R. 6505) to revive and reenact an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, connecting Little Rock and Argenta;

A bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; and

A bill (H. R. 7137) to provide for printing and binding for the Navy Department.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1825) to incorporate the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

CLAIMS OF UNITED STATES AND TENNESSEE.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time Senate joint resolution 91. I will state briefly that it is a joint resolution authorizing the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War to meet three commissioners appointed by the State of Tennessee for the purpose of investigating and reporting upon certain claims of the Government of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims of the State of Tennessee against the Government of the United States. I desire that the joint resolution shall be now considered, and will say that if it consumes any time in debate I will withdraw the request.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call up, after action is had upon the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Tennessee, the conference report before the Senate on the resolutions in regard to Cuba, on which the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] thinks he has a meritorious claim to the floor; and I will yield to that with pleasure. After he is through, I intend to press for action upon the conference report, and give notice that from this time forward I shall seek as early a vote as possible upon the adoption of the report and the passage of the resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 91) providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims of the State of Tennessee against the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 5979) for the right of the Rock Island, Muscatine and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Illinois and Mississippi Canal;

A bill (H. R. 6304) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at Knoxville, Tenn.; and

A bill (H. R. 6505) to revive and reenact an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, connecting Little Rock and Argenta.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; and

A bill (H. R. 7137) to provide for printing and binding for the Navy Department.

The bill (H. R. 900) to provide for the payment of the claim of William H. Mahoney was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 2290) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the State of South Dakota was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 5229) for the relief of George H. Lott was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Cuban resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I shall vote against concurring in the report of the conference committee. The few remarks which I shall submit are intended more as an explanation of the vote which

I shall give than as any elaborate argument upon the questions involved.

Permit me at the outset to state to the Senate the precise parliamentary status. Unless we are entirely satisfied with these three distinct resolutions, we must vote to nonconcur. They are not now in a situation to be amended; they can not be altered; they can not be changed; no instructions can be given in regard to them. The only question upon which we are permitted to vote under the present parliamentary situation is whether we agree or disagree to this conference report. I shall vote against concurring, because I object to the terms of the third resolution. I base my objection upon that third resolution only. Let me proceed to examine it. I will read it:

Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European Governments and their colonies on this continent; but from the very close relations between the people of the United States and those of Cuba, in consequence of its proximity and the extent of the commerce between the two peoples, the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens, by intervention if necessary.

I shall vote against concurring in the conference report to the end that, if it shall be disagreed to, we may then proceed to strike out the third resolution by appropriate parliamentary methods. There are several ways in which that can be done, if the report shall be disagreed to. It is not necessary that I should now specify them. To disagree to the conference report is the only way in which we can now change the terms of these resolutions.

Let me read the first part of the third resolution. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European Governments and their colonies on this continent.

In order to understand what that resolution means, we must understand what the word "intervention" means. If, as here used, it means that we have not interfered by taking a hostile part in the struggles between European governments and their colonies on this continent, then it states the truth. I do not understand that any reason exists why that fact should be reiterated in this connection; but if it means that we have not at any time intervened in the sense of recognizing those colonies as belligerents, it is not true. If it means that we have not interfered by recognizing the independence of those colonies, it is not true. It all depends upon what is meant by the word "intervention."

We did intervene years ago when Spain was having conflicts with its colonies in this hemisphere. We did intervene by recognizing them as belligerents. We did more than that. We recognized their independence. Therefore something more must have been meant when the House of Representatives adopted the word "intervened" in this connection.

I need not remind the Senate that this is not one of its resolutions. The Senate abandoned the two resolutions which had passed the Senate—abandoned them without the firing of a gun and with little consultation—and surrendered to the House of Representatives and adopted these three resolutions, to the third of which I now object. Therefore I say at the outset that in the sense in which it must be used here, there is intended something more than intervention by the recognition of belligerency, something more than intervention by the recognition of independence. It probably means to declare that we have not intervened by taking a hostile part in the struggle, by actively aiding with arms and men and money one side or the other. Mr. President, I object to that part of the resolution as unnecessary. It has no connection, necessarily, with the subject.

What follows? These words follow at the end:

That the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens by intervention, if necessary.

What intervention? Not the intervention mentioned before; not the intervention mentioned in the first line of the third resolution, because it says "the United States has not intervened." It does not mean intervention by recognition as belligerents; it does not mean recognition of independence. It means something more. We are to intervene not by those methods; but if it has any legitimate meaning at all, it means that this country is to take an active and hostile part in the struggle between Spain and its colony of Cuba.

Mr. President, an unnecessary resolution is an unwise one. This is an unnecessary resolution. It is subject to double construction; it is liable to misinterpretation; it will breed mischief in the future. All that the Senate intended to do the other day when it passed its resolutions, for which I voted, was to declare two points; first, that a state of war existed between Spain and its colony of Cuba which, in our opinion, warranted the recognition of the insurgents as belligerents; second, that the kind offices of this Government should be extended to the end of securing independence. We need not have gone further; we ought not to have gone further. This resolution, as I say, is likely to complicate us.

What is meant by this term "intervention"? We have already declared that we think the Cubans should be recognized as belligerents: we have already expressed our opinion that the President should exercise his friendly offices to the end that Cuban independence may occur in the future. Therefore this intervention means something different from that. It may mean war. I suggest that it is an unwise step for us to take. Let the future take care of itself. Let us declare where we stand to-day, and not anticipate events.

This resolution is subject to another objection. It reads:

The Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens by intervention.

It sounds too much like a threat, too much like buncombe. If we indorse the general proposition that this Government should be prepared to do whatever is necessary, it means little or nothing. Of course it follows that we should always do whatever is actually necessary. Do we mean simply to utter a truism, that this Government intends to do whatever is necessary? Whatever ought to be done, of course, we should do. If this mere declaration has any meaning whatever, it means more than that. That is the reason it is mischievous. Let us be frank with ourselves; let us be frank to Spain; let us be frank to Cuba; let us not deceive either party to this controversy. What does it mean? "Should be prepared" is the phrase used.

Let the preparation, if necessary, be by bill. Let the preparation be made, not by mere declaration, not by ex parte statements. If it means that we should increase our Navy, if it means that we should increase our Army, let us proceed by bill duly introduced, to which the President of the United States can become a party; let us proceed to prepare, not by threatening preparations, not by idle boasts of preparation, but by legitimate bills. Let us raise the necessary revenue, let us prepare for action by bill. What are we going to be prepared for? Let us see:

To protect the legitimate interests of our citizens.

Let me suggest that hardly anyone would think of protecting their illegitimate interests. What interests? Not their lives; not their safety; not their comfort; but their moneyed interests. "Protect" their "interests" means moneyed interests, because the resolution in its words just immediately preceding speaks of "losses upon the people of the United States."

We are, then, to intervene, not on the score of humanity—this resolution does not place our intervention upon any such high ground—not for the purpose of stopping bloodshed; not for liberty's sake; not because we want to help along free institutions. Oh, no; no such words are used. But the third resolution says:

The Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens—the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States.

Mr. President, this is basing our proposed action upon a very low ground. If there must be intervention in the form in which this third resolution states, whatever it may mean, let it be placed upon some higher ground than the mere losses to some of the business interests of our country; let it be put upon the broad ground of stopping bloodshed; let it be put upon the broad ground of doing something for a people struggling to be free; let us put it upon the ground of our sympathy with the establishment of republics, but do not put it upon the low ground that we are losing a few dollars by this contest between Spain and Cuba.

I know that it is said: "Well, this action amounts to nothing; we only propose to interfere if necessary; that is all the resolution says." An unnecessary resolution is an unwise one, as I have said, for what it eventually proposes is not stated, and we have to guess at it.

Mr. President, I am not aware of any very great losses which this Government is suffering on account of the war in Cuba. I know I am besieged with telegrams from New York. People there have seen this resolution, have seen the low ground that is proposed to be occupied with regard to this question, and some of them seem to think that this is a mere question of dollars and cents, and that is all, and that we ought to stop passing resolutions here if such action affects some of our merchants in our cities.

I suppose if we proceed at all here we should proceed upon some ground upon which we can stand, and not upon the ground that some people trading with Cuba are being affected. I have a telegram from New York. I shall not give the names of the very respectable gentlemen who send it, but they hold high positions in the commercial world. The telegram is as follows:

Present attitude of the United States toward Cuba seriously affecting commerce of New York with that island. Merchants of Cuba are combining to boycott American products in consequence of Congressional action, and have cabled canceling all orders and shipments.

And they expect me to base my vote upon a grave international question of right or wrong upon the mere point that some Spanish merchants in Cuba are boycotting my constituents in New York. Mr. President, with all due respect to these gentlemen, our action here should proceed upon higher ground, better ground, more tenable ground than this.

Sir, you will recollect that in the days of the American Revolution there were people who deplored war. Every great struggle for independence has had its opponents who have tried to stop it or to take advantage of the incidents of war for the purpose of realizing money. You recollect that old story, that you will permit me here to read, found in Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry:

The case of John Hook, to which my correspondent alludes, is worthy of insertion. Hook was a Scotchman, a man of wealth, and suspected of being unfriendly to the American cause. During the distresses of the American Army consequent on the joint invasion of Cornwallis and Phillips in 1781, a Mr. Venable, an army commissary, had taken two of Hook's steers for the use of the troops. The act had not been strictly legal, and on the establishment of peace, Hook, under the advice of Mr. Cowan, a gentleman of some distinction in the law, thought proper to bring an action of trespass against Mr. Venable in the district court of New London.

Mr. Henry—

appeared for the defendant, and is said to have disported himself in this cause to the infinite enjoyment of his hearers, the unfortunate Hook always excepted. After Mr. Henry became animated in the cause, says a correspondent, he appeared to have complete control over the passions of his audience. At one time he excited their indignation against Hook. Vengeance was visible in every countenance. Again, when he chose to relax and ridicule him, the whole audience was in a roar of laughter. He painted the distresses of the American Army, exposed almost naked to the rigor of a winter's sky and marking the frozen ground over which they marched with the blood of their unshod feet. "Where was the man," he said, "who had an American heart in his bosom, who would not have thrown open his fields, his barns, his cellars, the doors of his house, the portals of his breast, to receive with open arms the meanest soldier in that little band of famished patriots? Where is the man? There it stands; but whether the heart of an American beats in his bosom you gentlemen are to judge." He then carried the jury, by the powers of his imagination, to the plains around York, the surrender of which had followed shortly after the act complained of. He depicted the surrender in the most glowing and noble colors of his eloquence. The audience saw before their eyes the humiliation and dejection of the British as they marched out of their trenches. They saw the triumph which lighted up every patriotic face, and heard the shouts of victory, and the cry of "Washington and liberty!" as it rung and echoed through the American ranks and was reverberated from the hills and shores of the neighboring river. "But, hark! what notes of discord are these which disturb the general joy and silence the acclamations of victory? They are the notes of John Hook, hoarsely bawling through the American camp, 'Beef! beef! beef!'"

Mr. President, in the years to come, when this resolution, if passed, shall be exhibited to posterity as an incident in this great crisis of our country's affairs, it will be said that the American Congress voted to intervene on the low ground that the war was entailing such losses upon the people of the United States. In other words, "Beef! beef! beef!" again. For these reasons I am opposed to the third section of the House resolutions which the conference committee saw fit to adopt, and I shall vote against them, in order that if the vote to concur shall be defeated we can strike out the third resolution. If we want to be prepared for whatever is necessary, while I see no necessity for declaring in advance what we are going to do or making any declaration upon the subject, I repeat, let it be done by proper measures brought in here without buncombe, without threat, without idle and empty declarations.

I am for the other two sections of the resolution. I voted for the two resolutions which the Senate passed the other day, which are substantially like these. I think I prefer possibly the Senate resolutions, but in substance they are the same and I shall not retract. I shall not take back that vote simply because there may be a little change of public sentiment or because some Spanish students have trampled upon the American flag. I am not frightened by any such occurrence.

What is the first resolution? It declares—

That in the opinion of Congress a state of public war exists in Cuba, the parties to which are entitled to belligerent rights, and the United States should preserve a strict neutrality between the belligerents.

I favor that resolution because it is an expression of the opinion of Congress. Does not a state of war exist in Cuba to-day? I know the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday said, "What proof have we of the existence of war there?" That country is full of reliable correspondents. Once in a while there are to be found a few reliable correspondents, and they are portraying every day in the newspapers of the country the details of a great war existing there. The morning papers, in which the press reports are contained, state that one of the generals of the insurgents is within a stone's throw of the capital of that country, the city of Habana.

Mr. President, it is idle to disguise the situation. The consular reports here show that a state of war exists. We can not shut our eyes to what is apparent to us. The precise extent of the war is not very material. The best information that I can obtain is that the insurgents have three-quarters of the island substantially under their control. We must determine this question from such light as we have.

I know it is said that we are embarrassing the Administration or the executive department by the passage of the resolution of opinion. I deny it. I think that if the Administration thought that the resolutions which have been pending before this body for some time were antagonizing to and embarrassing them, some one here upon this side of the Chamber would have knowledge of the fact. I can not believe that the officials of this Government would keep their own counsels so closely that no one would know what the Administration desires.

Mr. President, we must determine this question from the facts which are before us. We must determine it from just such knowledge as we have, from official reports, from newspapers, from the magazines, from any source whatever from which it may come to us.

My distinguished friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday said in substance that this is an idle resolution. He says it has no legal effect. He says that it is a Pickwickian resolution. The reason why he so stated is that it is concurrent in its form, and also because it expresses the opinion of Congress.

But a short time since we passed a resolution authorizing the Judiciary Committee to examine the whole question as to the legal effect of concurrent resolutions and whether all resolutions ought not to be signed by the President. The distinguished chairman of the committee honored me by making me a member of the subcommittee with himself, but without his usual courtesy, to which I bear cheerful testimony, he has concluded to determine the question all by himself, and yesterday he boldly declared that this resolution was meaningless, of no effect, because the President would not have to sign it. I supposed that was the very question which we were going to consult about as a subcommittee.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from New York pardon me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that the question submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary is the same proposition in regard to which I expressed an opinion yesterday, or that it has anything to do with it. I certainly have no such understanding. If I am not interfering with the Senator from New York too much, perhaps he will allow me to state my proposition.

Mr. HILL. I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who wishes to follow me. But I will hear a question.

Mr. HOAR. No; I want to be permitted to point out to the Senator, if he has no objection, that I think he misconceives the argument I made yesterday.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Massachusetts may proceed.

Mr. HOAR. My proposition was and is that this declaration, by a concurrent resolution, has no legal effect whatever. It does not relate at all to the question whether certain concurrent resolutions may have legal effect without the signature of the President or whether they can be passed.

We have neutrality laws making it a highly penal offense to sell arms to the insurgent subjects of a government with which we are at peace unless they have been previously recognized as belligerents, and rendering the cargoes containing such arms or other warlike assistance liable to seizure. Now, my proposition is that a resolution by the two Houses of Congress, not assented to by the President, declaring a state of belligerency, has no legal effect whatever. So any citizen who, relying on it, would do an act to-morrow after its passage which would be unlawful yesterday, would be liable still to all the penalties of trading with the insurgent subjects of a government with which we are at peace and whose belligerency we have not acknowledged. That is the proposition.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator place his opinion upon the ground that the President has not signed the resolution of Congress?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly. If the President signs this resolution of Congress or a resolution declaring belligerency, then an American citizen without committing a crime, as it is said, and I suppose truly, by the Senators representing the Committee on Foreign Relations, may sell arms and other munitions of war to the rebels.

Mr. HAWLEY. Or to the Spaniards.

Mr. HOAR. Or to the Spaniards.

Mr. MORGAN. He can do it now.

Mr. HOAR. Not to the insurgents.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOAR. I do not so understand.

Mr. MORGAN. Unquestionably.

Mr. HOAR. We have been seizing ships.

Mr. HILL. I do not propose at this time to enter upon the question as to whether the signature of the President is necessary in order to give validity to the resolution, because we seem to agree upon that point, and I think the Senator, instead of relieving himself of the difficulty, has only added to it.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator claim that the law of the land would be changed one particle by the passage of these resolutions without the signature of the President?

Mr. HILL. After hearing the argument of the Senator yesterday, which was in accordance with my previous opinion upon this subject, I am inclined to agree with him that this resolution has no legal effect without the signature of the President, and, being a concurrent resolution, it will not be presented to the President for that purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. HILL. So we have both separately, two members of the committee, not jointly but concurrently, arrived at the same opinion without any report.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the indulgence of the Senator from New York——

Mr. HILL. And in that view I now propose further to discuss it and to show that it is a proper resolution under the circumstances. I will hear the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], however.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator permit me for one moment, in order that we may put this matter entirely right? I do not understand that the question submitted to the Judiciary Committee is, whether a concurrent resolution like this would have validity without the signature of the President. I do not suppose there is a member of this body who has a doubt in his mind upon that subject; possibly the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] may have, but I do not suppose any others have. I speak of the claim of the Senator from Alabama about making war by act of Congress without the President.

But I understood that the claim had been made, which I at one time was inclined to support, that we could not pass a concurrent resolution at all without the signature of the President, because the Constitution says that every vote to which the assent of both Houses is necessary shall be submitted to the President. So it was claimed that where a statute says the two Houses of Congress may join in ordering printing, still, notwithstanding the statute, we must get the signature of the President to the concurrent resolution for printing, and so in regard to other public expenditures.

Mr. HILL. I think I understand the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Now, I understand the question submitted to us is, whether the signature of the President is essential in all cases of concurrent resolutions or only as to those concurrent resolutions to which the vote of the two Houses is constitutionally necessary. It does not touch this question at all.

Mr. HILL. I do not think it wise to interrupt my remarks by a discussion of this abstract question. The Senator, when he reads my resolution, which the Senate adopted and which has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and which we are both considering separately from one another, will find it precisely as I have described it. I yield a moment to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I was merely going to ask the indulgence of the Senator from New York that I might call to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] some language he used in his speech yesterday which I feared might be misleading, as coming from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, to the people of the United States who are interested in these transactions that he described. He has said, and I think has said truly, that perhaps this resolution, if it were passed, would make no difference in the situation of those who are furnishing arms to the insurgents in Cuba. But I think he has perhaps either been misreported or inadvertently said what he is reported as saying yesterday in these words:

> If any unhappy manufacturer or maker of arms, encouraged by this resolution, goes down to Mobile and sells them to a Cuban insurgent, or sends them from New York, and sets up in his defense that his Government has declared that those people are belligerents, he is liable to be indicted and convicted for a breach of our neutrality laws next week, just as he would have been last week before the resolution was passed.

What I want to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to is that statement of the law which I do not think, when he comes to read it over, he will consider as reflecting his real opinion in this matter. I should be sorry if the people of this country should understand that an ordinary commercial venture by any citizen of the United States, sending arms openly to Cuba, if you please, selling them without disguise to an insurgent, is a breach of our neutrality laws.

Mr. HOAR. I did not speak of an ordinary commercial venture. I spoke of ventures prohibited by the neutrality laws.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I am very glad to have given him an opportunity of correcting the impression which the country might obtain from the use of that language.

Mr. HOAR. I did not use the phrase "ordinary commercial venture."

Mr. HILL. I do not think it wise to go off into a discussion of the neutrality laws.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the decision of the circuit court of appeals of the United States for the ninth circuit, reported in the case of the Itata (56 Federal Reporter), and also to the case decided by Judge Blatchford in Florida, reported in 4 Benedict, and also to the opinion of Attorney-General Speed, which I quoted the other day, all of which go to the extent that commercial ventures such as those referred to by the Senator from Delaware may be undertaken and carried on from the United States, not in the form of an expedition, but that the mere selling of arms and munitions is not unlawful.

Mr. HILL. I will now continue the argument which I had contemplated making. I referred simply to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts had characterized this resolution as Pickwickian in its character, as not amounting to anything, for various reasons, and among others because it was the mere expression of an opinion, that it was a concurrent resolution, etc.

Away back in 1836 Mr. Clay did not think that a resolution of Congress expressing its opinion upon a question of this character was Pickwickian. On the contrary, in a report which he made in that year he laid it down that while the Constitution vested in the President mainly the care of our diplomatic relations, yet Congress could properly pass resolutions expressing its opinion. What would have been the argument if the Committee on Foreign Relations had presented a joint resolution? Would the Senator from Massachusetts have voted for it then? Of course he would not. What, then, would have been the argument? It would have been said, "You are embarrassing the President." It would have been said that the Constitution contemplates that the President shall be the final judge of what ought to be done, and it would have been said that the resolutions were wrong and improper, because we were interfering with the prerogatives of the President. That would have been the argument.

I am for this resolution declaring that in our opinion a state of war exists which requires the recognition of belligerent rights, because it is merely an opinion, because it is respectful to Spain, because it is respectful to the President, because it does not ignore the President, because it does not require Executive approval, because, after all, it leaves it to the President to exercise his prerogatives under the Constitution, to do as he sees fit on this question, having possibly greater knowledge on the subject, taking into consideration, and with respect, as he assuredly will do, the opinion of Congress.

I should have hesitated long before I should have voted for a joint resolution which would compel the action of the President within ten days. This resolution recognizes the propriety of his having the final determination of this question, and it is an appropriate resolution, not a Pickwickian one, just such a one as Henry Clay approved in 1836.

It is a safe resolution, because it is merely an expression of opinion. It does not bind anyone except those who declare what their opinion is. It has its moral effect. It will be received with respect by the executive department. It has its moral effect throughout the country. It will have its moral effect throughout the world. This is exactly the way in which such resolutions have been adopted in the past.

Away back in the thirties, when Mr. Jackson was President, Congress passed a concurrent resolution—not a joint one—expressing its opinion (I have it before me, but I will not detain the Senate by reading it), not upon the mere question of belligerency, but upon the greater question of the recognition of the independence of Texas. It was not expected that it would be presented to the President for approval. It was not presented to the President for approval. It was simply a concurrent resolution expressing the opinion of Congress. Therefore Senators can not rise here in their places and say that this is an unprecedented resolution. It is in accordance with precedent, it is a safe, it is a conservative, it is a fair resolution; it is the very action which we ought to take. Thus far should we go and no farther upon this point.

Mr. President, Senators have read with words of approval the protest of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward against what they termed the premature acknowledgment of the belligerency of the Confederate States. With all due respect to those distinguished statesmen, and I would not detract a single word from their high places in history, it is impossible to read those protests and not think they were wrong. In May, 1861, several foreign governments properly recognized the Confederate States as belligerents, not their independence. That recognition took place before a single prisoner of war had been exchanged between the two armies, and yet Senators read from old musty documents that there can be no recognition until prisoners of war have been exchanged. Of course Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward felt it was their duty to protest.

There has never been an insurrection anywhere or a rebellion anywhere that the parent government did not see fit to protest against the recognition of the insurgents as belligerents. Why? For the purpose, if possible, of preventing a recognition of independence. I recollect what Henry Ward Beecher once said in an address. He said: "If you want to keep a man whom you are walking with at about a certain proper pace, you must keep all the while a few steps ahead of him." So, in order to prevent the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States, it was deemed wise upon their part to protest against the recognition of them as belligerents. Suppose that course had not been adopted; do you think the United States would not themselves have recognized the Confederates as belligerents? Did they not, in fact? Did they not very soon thereafter begin a series of recognitions between the two troops? Were not flags of truce recognized? Were not prisoners of war exchanged? You can not prosecute a whole people for treason. That is the reason why you must recognize these great contending forces as belligerents.

Three-quarters of the Island of Cuba is in insurrection to-day. They say that the insurgents are overrunning, not actually occupying, the island. Be that as it may, it is proper in the interests of humanity, it is proper in the interest of the orderly conduct of civilized warfare, that those people should be recognized as belligerents. Must the strife go on? Must we encourage it? Will we stand by and allow those prisoners, who are virtually prisoners of war, to be executed, to be guillotined, to be hung upon the gallows? This may be done, and we have no power or influence to stop it unless we recognize those people as belligerents.

Mr. President, the recognition of belligerency is nothing with which Spain can find any fault. It gives no real offense to Spain. It is in accordance with the dictates of humanity; it is in accordance with established usage. We can not do less. The whole question of belligerency is addressed to the discretion of other than the contending powers. There is no precise rule laid down. Each case must be judged from its own circumstances. No harm can be done by our proposed action. It may tend to stay the cruel warfare that is being continued in that island.

Mr. President, what further should we do? I do not intend to argue the second proposition, because it seems to be generally conceded that the second resolution, which simply provides that this Government should tender its kindly offices to the end of securing independence, should be adopted. Even the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] averred that he was willing to vote for that resolution, and when the Senator from Massachusetts can not find fault with a resolution it is pretty good evidence that no one else can. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, this is our position upon this second question. He agrees with us. He agrees with those who voted the other day that it is an appropriate time for this Government to say that its friendly offices should be exercised to the end of securing Cuban independence. And yet in the next breath he says the insurrection is not of that nature, is not of that proportion, is not of that strength that we ought to recognize the insurgents as belligerents. He would ask this Government to interfere, to interfere to the end that these insurgents may be recognized as an independent government, but in the meantime he would not give them the right of belligerents. I think that is an inconsistent position. I think that if he stands ready to welcome Cuban independence, if he thinks that the best interests of Spain, of Cuba, of the United States, and of the world will be subserved by granting those people independence, he might strain a little further and accord to these poor people belligerent rights in the meantime.

Mr. President, there have been many quotations made here from General Grant's messages and the reports of Mr. Secretary Fish. Mr. Fish, as well as President Grant, in their messages and reports, said that the question of Cuban independence was a mere matter of a short time; that in the end it was bound to come. Both of them stated that over and over again. They said repeatedly, it is impossible that this foreign Government of Spain away across the waters should be permitted to plunder, to rob, to unduly tax those people; that they have struggled for years against such oppression and that there could be but one final result, and that would be independence for Cuba sooner or later.

In view of those statements, in the light of that experience, in view of all that has taken place in that unfortunate island, may we not well anticipate that that independence will surely come in the very near future? If we think it will come, may we not act upon such light as we have before us and say, in the great struggle for that independence which is to come surely and inevitably, we will in the meantime rid this warfare of some of its hardships, some of its infamies, some of its degradation, some of its brutality? For that is all that this resolution, in effect, proposes to do.

I therefore, for these reasons, thus hastily expressed, am in favor of the first two resolutions which are involved in the conference report. I am opposed to the third one, and therefore must vote to nonconcur, because I do not like the pusillanimous and inconsistent terms, the unfortunate terms, the unwise terms, of the said resolution. Let us put our action upon high ground. What position we should take is very clear to me.

Mr. President, while the true policy of this Government is that of peace—not peace at any price, but peace with honor—and while our general policy is that of nonintervention in the affairs of other countries, yet let me repeat what has been so often stated here and elsewhere, that as one of the free States among nations—one of the greatest of Republics—it is impossible that our principles, our sentiments, and our example should not produce effect upon the opinions and hopes of society throughout the civilized world; and if other peoples, no matter in what quarter of the globe, whether near our own shores or in the distant waters of the Pacific, imbued with the same spirit of liberty—catching the inspiration of our success—desire to found a Republic and throw off the shackles of a monarchy, if we can not consistently give them a helping hand, at least we should not retard them; we should not crush them; we should not frown upon them; we should not stand up so straight as to lean over backward against them in the exercise of a strict and cold neutrality; but on the contrary, we should encourage and cheer them in all the ways and methods permissible under the wise rules of international law. In short, such efforts on our part as well as our sympathies should be extended to every people struggling to be free from the burdens, oppressions, and wrongs of monarchial government.

We can not ignore the fact that we set them their example. We are responsible for the lessons we have taught the world. We established the doctrine that the right of revolution for just cause exists. Who so craven as now wants to abandon it?

What is the situation? The people of Cuba have founded a Republic and are seeking to maintain it. They are resisting the right of taxation without just representation. They want some voice in their own Government. They naturally object to longer being governed by a distant power that does not in fact govern, but oppresses and plunders them. It is the old story of our American Revolution over again. There were Tories then, as there are Tories now whose sympathies are with aristocratic and monarchial governments. They will be crushed now, as they were then, by the force of the enlightened and intelligent public sentiment of a free people determined to maintain free institutions for liberty's sake alone.

We can not shut our eyes to the fact that there exists what Mr. Seward calls "an irrepressible conflict" between the forces of republicanism on the one hand and the forces of monarchy on the other hand, between absolute and constitutional governments, between those who believe in the divine right of kings to rule and those who believe that society itself shall have a substantial part in its own government.

The people of the United States have chosen their side in that great conflict which is constantly being waged, sometimes quietly, secretly, and peacefully, sometimes openly, through revolution and bloodshed.

The establishment of republics is in the line of the progress of civilization. The history of the last half century shows that the salutary influence of our example has performed its work.

One of the greatest nations of the earth, France, which shared with us the glory and dangers of our own Revolution, has taken her place among the sisterhood of republics and planted the citadel of liberty in the very heart of monarchical Europe. The South American countries are nearly all Republics. Mexico long since threw off kingly rule and will never resume it. The revolution in Hawaii—no matter how instituted—resulted in another republic, and it is our earnest wish that it may have long life and prosperity.

Cuba now wants to join the procession of Republics, that it may receive with us the blessings of liberty and good government. God grant that she may succeed. But whether she succeeds or not, we shall at least have the proud consciousness that we have discharged our duty to it, to mankind, and to liberty.

Let us discharge our duty as we understand it and as we see it at this time. Let the future take care of itself. What position we may safely, wisely, and consistently take in this crisis I have already indicated. Let us go no further at this time. Let us not anticipate events, but leave future conditions and situations to be solved when they arise. In conclusion, permit me to quote the appropriate words of Daniel Webster in his great speech in the House of Representatives in 1823 in behalf of the virtual recognition of Grecian independence, when he said:

> What part it becomes this country to take on a question of this sort, so far as it is called upon to take any part, can not be doubtful. Our side of this question is settled for us, even without our own volition. Our history, our situation, our character, necessarily decide our position and our course before we have even time to ask whether we have an option. Our place is on the side of free institutions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair always lays the unfinished business before the Senate at the proper time.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me that I may introduce a joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

[The joint resolution introduced by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon appears under its appropriate heading.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, just one word. I recognize the fact that notwithstanding a special order was made for 2 o'clock to-day, both the unfinished business and the conference report are privileged questions, and that therefore the special order must go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that the controversy or apparent conflict between the two propositions may be very easily reconciled. I understand the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] desires to speak on the subject of the contested-election case, that being a privileged question. I desire also to speak upon the other privileged question pending; and it would embarrass the Chair somewhat and the Senate also to select. I propose therefore to go on and not make a very long speech, a comparatively short one in the Senate Chamber, and then to give way to the Senator from North Carolina, who desires to go away. But it is understood that after that the Cuban resolution shall be acted upon until it is definitely settled.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am not so certain about that.

Mr. WOLCOTT (to Mr. SHERMAN). Understood by whom?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Senator from Oregon himself to consent.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I stated yesterday that after the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], so far as I was concerned, having charge of the Du Pont case, I would give way to the Cuban resolution, but unfortunately the speech of the Senator from Indiana continued until a late hour and the Senator from Ohio left the Chamber, and, of course, the Cuban question was not taken up yesterday. I hardly feel at liberty at this time to consent that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from North Carolina the Du Pont case shall be shelved until the Cuban question is finally settled.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that in the judgment of the Chair the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] is now entitled to the floor upon the unfinished business, it having been laid before the Senate. Does the Senator from Ohio submit a request?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, I did. I desire also to accommodate the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and I think we may as well have the arrangement made now. The Senator from Missouri desires to address the Senate upon a subject to-morrow. I think that also should be understood.

Mr. COCKRELL. Immediately after the completion of the routine morning business to-morrow.

Mr. CALL. What is the arrangement proposed?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will allow me to proceed on the Cuban question.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from North Carolina to yield to me for a single moment.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad to have an executive session for a few moments—I think thirty minutes will be sufficient—immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina. If that can not be obtained, I had intended to ask it immediately after the routine business to-morrow, but I can not afford to interfere with my friend from Missouri. The main reason for my request is because my physical condition is such that I want to get away from here in the next few days, and there is a matter that I must see disposed of before I can get away.

Mr. MILLS. Can we not do that this evening?

Mr. COCKRELL. We can do that to-day.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent that we may have an executive session immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. No, no; I can not consent to that.

Mr. HARRIS. Immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CALL. I wish to understand what is to become of the Cuban resolution before I assent to that. I should be glad to learn from the Senator from Ohio what is to be done with the resolution that has been under consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already asked that the pending business be temporarily laid aside until I can make my remarks.

Mr. STEWART. Before that is done——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the request of the Senator from Ohio, and the Chair will then recognize the Senator from Nevada. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily in order that he may address the Senate upon the Cuban resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. At this time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At this time. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. STEWART. I do not think that the proceeding is quite fair to go on in this way by unanimous consent. A resolution is taken up and one Senator makes a speech and then gives the floor to another. There are several who may want to make some remarks, but these arrangements have been going on for a week and the floor is preempted all the while. I shall object to this order of proceeding. One or the other of these two measures should be taken up and disposed of and there should not be unanimous consent given for a certain Senator to make a speech on one measure and then change over to the other by unanimous consent. It appears to put the business of the Senate in a condition in which there is not an equal chance all around. So I object to any more unanimous-consent agreements. Let the Senate decide which case it will take up beforehand.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senator from North Carolina will yield to me, I suggest that the only difficulty was one inadvertently created by the Senator from Ohio. As I understand it, the Senator from North Carolina has the floor intending to address the Senate upon the Du Pont case. He yields to the Senator from Ohio, who has some remarks to make upon the Cuban resolution. That is within the province of the Senator from North Carolina. When the Senator from Ohio has concluded his remarks, the Senator from North Carolina will resume the floor and make his remarks upon the Du Pont case, and then the Senate can determine whether it will proceed with that resolution or what it will take up.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not understood from the Senator from North Carolina that he has yielded the floor. The Chair submitted to the Senate the request of the Senator from Ohio that the pending resolution, which is the unfinished business, be laid aside in order that the Senator from Ohio might address the Senate. To that objection was interposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. The Chair recognizes the Senator from North Carolina upon the unfinished business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the floor, I think.

Mr. HARRIS. Was my request for an executive session at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina put to the Senate?

Mr. PRITCHARD. I have the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee has addressed the Chair upon a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair understood the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to object.

Mr. GRAY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CALL. I do not object except as to its consideration at this time. As was suggested by the Senator from Colorado, when the speech of the Senator from North Carolina has been concluded there will be ample time to make that arrangement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. So the Chair has stated. What is the inquiry of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. GRAY. It is this: I am anxious to hear the Senator from North Carolina, but is it competent for the Senator from North Carolina to take the floor upon the unfinished business and yield the floor to anyone and then resume it except by unanimous consent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will determine that question as the Chair has determined it before. If the Senator from North Carolina yields the floor for any purpose, unless he yields during an argument for a question, he can not thereafter control the floor. The Chair knows of no authority for one Senator to yield the floor to another. The Senator from North Carolina has been recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I appeal to the Senator from Nevada and to the Senate that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senator from Ohio be permitted to make his speech on the Cuban matter at this time.

Mr. GRAY and others. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The unfinished business is laid aside temporarily at the request of the Senator from Oregon, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I would not trespass again on the attention of the Senate upon the Cuban question, and I would have been entirely content to leave the discussion of this interesting topic to the speeches that were made while the resolution was pending in the Senate, but since that time the adoption of the resolution of the House, the action of the conference committee upon it, and the sudden exploit, I may say, of my friend from Massachusetts on my left [Mr. HOAR] induce me to participate a little further in this debate. I do it very reluctantly to-day, because I desire in every way to promote the wishes and convenience of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD].

The Senator from Massachusetts by his early directions to his colleague convinced me that he was one of the strongest supporters of the policy of recognizing the belligerent rights of Cuba, and assisting, if possible, in gaining its independence. He was not satisfied with the resolution reported by the Senate committee, as it was quite conservative, very considerate of the dignity and pride of Spain, and very carefully prepared in its language, but he preferred the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] as an amendment or substitute to the proposition of the committee. That resolution went far beyond the resolution of the committee. The Senator from Massachusetts having committed himself to that resolution, I assumed that he would vote for any proposition falling short of it, if he could not get that.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator have that resolution read?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do so after a while. The Senator, however, in a sudden way, without notice to me, although we are very near neighbors, sitting side by side, and always possessing my highest regard and respect, introduced a resolution of an extraordinary character. The resolution reported to the Senate was adopted by a majority of more than 10 to 1, and a substitute for it was adopted by the House of Representatives by more than 15 to 1. These disagreeing resolutions were brought into conference, and after full consideration that of the House was adopted by the conference and the report signed by all of the conferees. Before any action has been taken in the Senate upon that report, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who had been absent at his home during the pendency of the debate on the Cuban question, rises in his place and offers a resolution taking the matter practically out of the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations and proposing to postpone consideration until toward the middle of April, and, if adopted, practically defeating the conference report.

This summary and unusual course excited some feeling. The Senator is probably aware that I am usually patient and cool, but I must confess that this sudden change disturbed my coolness and patience. I thought it was a very undeserved reproach, a very severe reflection upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, which had given to the Cuban war the most careful study, and therefore when I expressed my views upon this subject I expressed them precisely as I felt.

Now, Mr. President, overlooking all this and thanking my honorable friend for the high compliment that he paid me yesterday, I advise the Senate that we are entirely reconciled and we can sit by the side of each other with mutual respect and esteem, which on my part I express to him heartily.

I wish to present, in a plain, sensible way, the Cuban resolution and the changes made by the Committee on Foreign Relations as the subject was developed. I said that the proposition submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] was not contained in the resolution first reported by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to interpose his friendly offices with the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

It was thought by the committee that it was injudicious to propose to Spain the independence of Cuba. It was regarded by the committee, and intended by the Senator who offered it, as a direct intervention by the people of the United States and a demand upon Spain—because it would have been construed as a demand—for the independence of Cuba. The resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations did not go so far. It provided as follows:

That, in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the Government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

That was the simple proposition of the Committee on Foreign Relations; but afterwards, upon further reflection and a thorough consideration of the whole subject in all its details, upon the presentation of the reports made by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Pennsylvania, we came to the conclusion that, on the whole, it was proper to annex to the resolution the resolution proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, somewhat modified, as follows:

Resolved further, That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

This resolution went far beyond the original resolution of the Senate committee; but it was proposed and agreed to in committee, and presented to the Senate, and adopted without amendment, and by the large vote I have already mentioned of 64 to 6.

The concurrent resolution in that form was sent to the House of Representatives, as I have already stated, and in the House a substitute for it was adopted by a vote of 262 to 17. On the action of the House being communicated to the Senate, the matter went into conference, the conferees on the part of the Senate being the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and myself.

After a careful examination by the conferees, without any feeling of rivalry whatever between the two Houses, without any other consideration except an earnest desire to do the best for the public interests and the most we could properly do for the people of Cuba, we agreed to accept the House proposition. It was substantially the same as that passed by the Senate, being only different in phraseology. By the adoption of the report of the committee of conference the matter would be settled, and the House would be relieved from further action. There will be no objection, as a matter of course, if a better scheme can be proposed, or if, as is thought by some Senators here, the third resolution is not exactly in proper language, it will be easy to have a further conference, so that the matter can be satisfactorily arranged; but, substantially, the two Houses have agreed in the resolutions passed by the respective Houses, both meaning practically the same thing.

The complaint of my friend from Massachusetts against the Committee on Foreign Relations was that the committee agreed to a milder measure than he thought ought to be adopted; that is, the resolution as reported by the committee did not contain the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and therefore he complained of our resolution because it did not go far enough. Yet he afterwards insisted very strongly that the resolutions as they now stand with the Cameron amendment inserted would give no relief to the struggling Cubans; that they would have no meaning, no force, either as law or as an expression of opinion. But, Mr. President, the expression of the opinion of the Congress of the United States in favor of the independence of Cuba, or in favor of local autonomy for Cuba, or in favor of Cuba in any form that recognized their equal rights as belligerents with the Spaniards who were treading over their soil, could not fail to have great weight. Such a proposition would, I believe, receive the hearty approval of the people of the United States whenever it should be put forth.

It was also complained that the resolutions were made concurrent. Certainly we might have converted them into a joint resolution, and thus have required the assent of the President to their passage; but the consideration which weighed with us, after full deliberation, was that we ought not to put the President in that position. Up to this time there has been no politics in this question, and I trust there never will be. We are not dealing in the petty or greater politics of the country, as the Senator from Massachusetts seems to think and conveys by a joke. We are dealing with the lives and property of nearly two millions of people who are bravely following the example of our Revolutionary fathers by fighting for liberty and republican rule.

Mr. TURPIE. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Ohio whether I understood the statement correctly that these resolutions reported from the conference committee had received the sanction of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee reported a single resolution, which was modified and adopted by the Senate. It was amended by a substitute by the House. The Senate disagreed to the House resolutions. That sent them into conference; but the original resolution reported to the Senate, I believe, was agreed to by the committee unanimously.

Mr. TURPIE. These resolutions have never been considered by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. The conference report?

Mr. MORGAN. The original resolutions?

Mr. TURPIE. The House resolutions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the resolutions before me here in print. I do not know to what my colleague on the committee refers.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the Senator from Ohio whether I understood his statement to be that these resolutions had received the sanction of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations? I ask if I was mistaken in that understanding, or whether the Senator wishes now to state that the three resolutions of the House of Representatives received the sanction of the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. SHERMAN. The House resolutions came over in the nature of a substitute. They were disagreed to in the Senate, and a committee of conference was ordered. That is the usual course pursued in such cases. Therefore, it is true that the House resolutions were never before the Committee on Foreign Relations; but they were referred to a committee of conference, composed of three members of each House, and the House resolutions were adopted by that committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the last two resolutions reported by the committee of conference have been before the Committee on Foreign Relations, for they are the resolutions offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]; but those were set aside in the report finally made from the Committee on Foreign Relations. So that those two resolutions, it may be considered, were laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me one moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. When the action of the House of Representatives was reported to the Senate, I followed the usual course and moved that the House substitute be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It went there. The substitute of the House and the original resolutions of the Senate were before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that committee, as I remember, authorized the chairman to move that the Senate disagree and ask for a committee of conference, the usual course, I think, and that is what was done.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the Senator will allow me a word. Some one has said, and the Senate apparently thinks, that the resolutions reported from the committee of conference have not been before the Committee on Foreign Relations. The committee of conference has taken two of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and incorporated them. The resolution that was rejected by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the resolution that has given rise to the most controversy here, appears as follows in the print of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts:

Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European Governments and their colonies on this continent; but from the very close relations between the people of the United States and those of Cuba in consequence of its proximity and the extent of the commerce between the two peoples, the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our people, by intervention if necessary.

That is the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERMAN. I intended to read that.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I should like permission to make a statement of my understanding of the present status. I do not question that these resolutions of the House were before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations; they were introduced there by a member of the committee; they were laid upon the table; the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations declined to report them, and they had only the support of one vote. Then the committee of conference met, and these same resolutions that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations had declined to report are returned now as a report from the committee of conference; but they never received the sanction of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I suppose everyone knows the course of business in such cases. These resolutions came back with a substitute from the House of Representatives, and the subject of the disagreement between the two Houses was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee advised the Senate not to concur in the House resolutions. They were then sent to a committee of conference, and after a careful examination on both sides it was concluded that, on the whole, the House resolutions were preferable. Whether we were right or wrong is a question which the Senate can determine at any moment.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire, respectfully, to object to further interruption.

Mr. HOAR. It is merely as to a question of fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

Mr. HOAR. Is it not true that every proposition in the conference report has once been rejected by the Committee on Foreign Relations—the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], the House resolutions, and all the resolutions?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; the first resolution, which contained the declaration of neutrality, very much as it now stands in the conference report, was in the resolutions reported.

Here I ought to say that this matter was long considered in the Committee on Foreign Relations. For many weeks we had it before us, and there were submitted to us a great mass of documentary evidence and information of various kinds, and the committee discussed the whole subject thoroughly.

The committee finally settled down upon a simple resolution, similar to the one which now stands as the first resolution. It so happened that during one of the meetings of the committee I was not in good health and was unable to attend, and a resolution was agreed to, which was handed over to the honorable Senator from Alabama to be reported to the Senate, with a written report, and the Senator from Pennsylvania submitted his resolution with quite a lengthy minority report, both of which reports were printed. The resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN was subsequently modified, and in this form, with the addition substantially of the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania, it was supported by the vote of every member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported here, and passed. This is the history of the action of the Senate.

Mr. President, I respectfully ask that Senators will not interrupt me further, because I am trespassing on the time of the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], who is entitled to the floor on the contested election case, and therefore I do not wish to be interrupted, as I desire to make my statement as clear and brief as possible.

The objection was made that the resolutions were concurrent. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] properly stated that. If after we had received the resolutions from the House of Representatives we had changed them to a joint resolution, they would necessarily have to be sent to the President of the United States; and at a critical period of the war in Cuba he would have been compelled to determine upon his executive action in ten days, and either approve or disapprove them. All we desired, however, was the moral influence of the declaration of Congress. We did not wish to place the President in a dilemma. I would say here, that no matter how many differences there may be between us and the President of the United States on questions of domestic policy, no one doubts his courage, his loyalty, his fidelity to the flag of our country in any contest with any foreign power. I believe that can be said of him with the hearty assent of nearly all.

I wish to state also that in the entire controversy between the two committees the question of party, whether Populist, Republican, or Democratic, was never mentioned or thought of, and the action of the committee and also the action of the Senate was practically unanimous. That was the reason why we did not send the resolutions to the President, and I think it was a very good reason.

When we came to examine the question, we had before us from the beginning of the session in December last the message of the President of the United States upon the subject. It is true the reference to the matter in that message was brief. We soon, however, had a multitude of other information. We had the current history of events, and we are accepting and acting on faith in the current history of events every day upon the most important as well as upon trifling matters; and though that history may not be always a reliable ground for action, it is very often our only mode of obtaining information, and we must judge of it as best we can, according to the source from which it comes. The committee had also before it the important fact that Campos, an able general of Spain, probably the most distinguished of his time, was suddenly displaced because of his disposition to compromise and make arrangements with the rebels, and General Weyler was appointed in his place.

Weyler was a general who was denounced before he came to Cuba as a tyrant—"butcher" is the name given to him—and his history has been detailed on this floor. It is true the honorable Spanish minister—and I think he was justified in doing so—endeavored to apologize for that general, and endeavored to show that Weyler's name was not mentioned in the book detailing the enormities to which I referred in my speech on the floor of the Senate. Sir, Weyler's name was mentioned in the paper from which I quoted and his character was referred to throughout; and when Weyler went to Cuba he did not deny it, but he said—and probably there is a good deal of force in that, and therefore it ought to be taken in mitigation of his offenses—that he was a lieutenant-colonel in the army, that he obeyed orders, and that his orders commanded these measures in order to put down and suppress the rebellion of ten years ago.

The House of Representatives had before it a document containing over 200 pages, which covered every portion of this controversy, and which was used in the Senate. We have the claim of the insurgents. My honorable friend from Massachusetts spoke of it as a matter of reproach that I introduced here a document coming from the agent of the insurgents.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I stated that the argument of one of the counsel for these belligerents was not a statement of fact on which we could proceed without knowing whether the committee had found those facts were true. I did not mean to reproach the Senator. My language is reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. That document contains their case; and in that document they present their grievances and the history of the war in which they are involved. The kindness and liberal disposition of Gomez and other generals in the treatment of prisoners of war, the mode and manner of conducting the war, and the constitution which was framed by the people of Cuba—most of them in the army—are all set out in detail.

Besides, we had the secret history of the correspondence with Spain. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] went to the State Department and was furnished by the Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, with all those private papers, which show more than any other the condition of affairs in Spain and the purposes of that country as therein revealed. As a matter of course, the contents of those papers were never disclosed to the public at large. We had the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, who went over the correspondence and communicated it to us, and we never revealed it in any way. I have said all that I desire to say in that connection.

Now, I wish to take up the resolutions before us and, in the briefest manner I can, present them, so that the Senate may see what they are. First, we must know what the facts are as they exist in Cuba. Cuba for fifty years has been in a state of rebellion, either slumbering or boldly engaged in revolution. Most of the people of Cuba are of native birth. It is said that about two-fifths of the people there are of negro descent or mixed descent of various kinds, some with Indian blood, but that about three-fifths of them are native Cubans of Spanish stock, and only 9 per cent are Spaniards. The whole history was brought out as to the strength of these people and as to the existence of a war. If war did not exist in Cuba, where did war ever exist?

All that makes war "hell on earth" is crowded into the history of Cuba. Murder, fire, the ravages of hate, and every form of crime is in the daily life of Cuba.

There are more than 100,000 Spanish soldiers on that island, which contains a population of 1,600,000 people. There is daily warfare, either in a limited scope or on a more extended scale. Who are the combatants? The Cubans and their allies on one side, whites and blacks, of whatever race or name, against the Spanish authorities and the comparatively few property holders who sympathize with them. It is said the insurgents are ignorant, uneducated soldiers. So they may be, but they are fighting for the same cause as the soldiers of our Revolutionary war. They have marched from one end of Cuba to the other. Where were the 100,000 Spaniards sent there to conquer the island and put down the rebellion? They were compelled to remain in the towns and places where they could seek protection through forts or otherwise. There never was a more clear conquest in the sense of possession of the Island of Cuba than those ignorant, uneducated soldiers won against the 100,000 soldiers of Spain. If this is not war, what is it?

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. The Spanish bureau, I believe, gave out this morning that there was a battle in which 3,000 insurgents were defeated. What can that be called? Is that war, or something else? It seems to me to be war.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, here was the condition with which we were confronted. We had to meet that peculiar state of affairs, which had been growing worse and worse all the time. We had to review the incidents of ten years ago. I have here an interesting fact which I think I ought to present to the Senate. At the close of the war of 1878 the insurgents had held power and possession of nine-tenths of Cuba for ten long years, fighting constantly. Finally they were persuaded to enter into negotiations for terms, and General Campos, who was then in command, a liberal and broad-minded soldier, held out to them the offer that they could have autonomy, that they could have representatives in the Cortes, that they could have a body of some 30 persons to make laws for them, that they should have protection and education, and that slavery in that country should be abolished. Those were the terms which were agreed upon. The Cubans thereupon laid down their arms, and what was the result? The Cortes refused to carry the promise into execution, and General Campos within a year after that wrote a letter in regard to the course of the Spaniards in that matter.

[From the Madrid Liga Agraria of July 27.]

Here is a letter of Gen. Martinez Campos, read in the Senate by Señor Canovas del Castillo on July 21, 1879, that is, after the peace of El Zanjon:

"Promises never fulfilled, abuses of all kinds, no provision made for agriculture and public works, the exclusion of the natives from all branches of administration, and other faults in plenty, gave rise to the insurrection of Yara. The conviction of successive governments that no other means can be used here but terror, and that it is a matter of dignity not to begin reforms as long as a shot is fired, made it continue. In this way we should have accomplished nothing, even though we covered the island with soldiers. If we do not wish to ruin Spain, we must take up frankly the question of liberties. I believe that if Cuba is too weak to be independent it is more than strong enough to become a Spanish province.

"In Santiago de Cuba it has been impossible to hold communication with the enemy's camp. There a mulatto is in command who once was a muleteer and now is a general. He has immense ambition, great valor, and great prestige; under a rough exterior he hides natural talents. We have been unable to do anything with him in spite of all that the Chamber and Government expected; he only consented to see Maximo Gomez in order to snub him; he insisted on seeing me to deceive me, and, worst of all, he has succeeded in winning over Vicente Garcia by appealing to his vanity; to gain him he turned over the command to him.

"This war can not be called a war; it is a hunt in a climate deadly to us, in a country worse than the desert. The financial situation can not be sustained. Men thought before that the character of the people living here was unsuited to war; whites and blacks have both proved the contrary to us; to-day they have become veterans, and if they have no great generals among them, they have what they need, excellent guerrilla leaders."

What have we done, from the peace of El Zanjon to this day, to prevent a repetition of what happened at Yara?

So that within one year after these terms were agreed upon the Spanish Government violated every one of them except the promise that slavery should be abolished. Yet within a year they were, by the outrageous oppression practiced upon them, forced to further hostilities.

I have here also a statement made by Mr. Margall, in which he speaks of the present condition of Cuba. He says:

PI Y MARGALL SPEAKS OUT FOR CUBA—PLAIN TALK FROM THE SPANISH STATESMAN, WHO ADVISES SPAIN TO GRANT HOME RULE WITHOUT DELAY TO THE CUBAN PATRIOTS.

[From the Madrid Don Quijote of July 12.]

We must endeavor to reestablish the principles of justice. No nation has the right to occupy territory inhabited by other men unless with their consent. Should a nation occupy it by force, the conquered can at all times fight against it till they drive it from their native land. No prescription is possible in this matter. Prescription does not apply, and can never apply, to the right to liberty and independence.

Whenever it concerned our own existence have not we Spaniards always understood this so? For two centuries we fought for our independence against ancient Rome. The Cantabrians, the last to keep up the struggle, threw themselves on their own swords in order not to become slaves. For seven centuries we fought against the Arabs, who had spread from Tarifa to the Pyrenees in the space of three years. The prescriptive rights of centuries were of no avail to them against us. Spaniards, like ourselves, were the men of Granada and of Seville when we forced them to leave the land; they traced descent from ten generations and more of Spaniards. We did not lay down our arms till we had driven them from our shores, and in Malaga we carried our cruelty to the point of stripping them of the gold and jewels that might have alleviated the miseries of exile.

Is it right that we, who acted in this manner, should now call those men bandits who rise to defend their independence against us? For the same deeds and the same cause shall they across the water be called outlaws while those in Spain we deem heroes? As heroes likewise are they esteemed throughout America and all the world, who in the first third of this century drove us out of Mexico, of Guatemala, of Colombia, of Ecuador, of Peru, and of Chile.

Let us be just to the men who to-day are fighting against us in Cuba. We ought long ago to have granted them the autonomy to which they have an undeniable right; we should have kept them united to the peninsula by the single tie of common interests, national and international. How much blood and treasure would have been spared by such a course! We were urged to it by reason, by right, by our self-interest, by the thought of the vast colonial empire we have lost. Unfortunately, for nations even more than for individuals, the force of habit is irresistible. Nothing could make us give up our old policy, a policy discredited by disaster to ourselves and to others.

If there is now a war in Cuba, the fault is ours, and ours alone. We have before us the imperative duty of repairing our mistake and putting a stop to the war. The war of 1868 lasted ten years and we could only make an end of it by a compromise. We then gave to the Cubans the rights and liberties which Puerto Rico already enjoyed. The compromise with which we shall have to terminate the present war, if Cuba does not prove stronger than we, let us make it now while we are still the more powerful and our generosity can not be branded as weakness. Seventeen years ago we gave them freedom; let us now give them autonomy. Let us make them masters and arbiters of their own destinies. Let us leave them to rule themselves in all matters pertaining to their internal life—political, administrative, and economic. And that our generosity may be better appreciated let us help them to pass from subjection to self-rule, without disturbance, without noise, without bloodshed.

Against such conduct the sentiment of patriotism is invoked. But above the idea of country rises that of humanity, and above both that of justice. Cuba is the grave of our youth in these deplorable wars. Our soldiers perish there by thousands, some victims of the climate, others of the lead and steel of the enemy. The greater part are dragged there by force, and must fight for a cause that is distasteful to them. It is the height of inhumanity not to find a means of sparing the blood of these men.

It is irritating to read and to hear, day after day, that it is necessary to send to Cuba regiment on regiment in order to make an end of the rebels and to leave the sovereignty of the nation firmly planted and established. If their patriotism is not false, those who say such things should join with their sons the vanguard of the army. It is easy to stay at home and send others to slaughter; it is easy, above all, to know nothing of the war, save through the narratives of the battles, read in winter by the table lamp and in summer in the shade of the public parks.

The sovereignty of the nation! Must the nation, to be sovereign, drain the life of the groups composing it? Does its sovereignty necessarily carry with it the slavery of the colonies? Its sovereignty is limited to the national interests. It must be confined to a form that will permit relations between the mother country and the colonies to exist.

Our national pride and the country's honor are also called in as reasons for continuing the war. As though it were a shame for a nation to grant what is justly due, as if honor would not suffer more by keeping on with the war and being beaten. Was it a small affront for us to ratify in Mexico, by the peace of Cordoba, the plan of Iguala, and in Peru to sign the shameful capitulation of Aycucho? The war will aggravate our already desperate economic situation. It is not yet three months since it began, and it has already cost us $7,000,000. In the estimates, made before the war broke out, a deficit of 6,000,000 pesetas was foreseen, and we all know how these deficits grow when the accounts are settled. Calculate what our deficit will be at the end of the next economic year, if the war continues.

F. PI Y MARGALL.

There are other documents which I have upon this subject, but I shall not delay the Senate by reading them. I will simply say that we had in all our investigations the amplest information that could be procured up to the time the new régime came in. Then, among the first acts done by Weyler was to organize a system of suppression of all information. He took possession of the telegraph and every means of transmitting intelligence, and for a time we did not get any news whatever, except that day by day there was a battle fought, that so many rebels had been killed, so many had been wounded; and so on, day in and day out, until it would appear that the whole rebellion was about to collapse, that there were no victories except upon one side; but it turns out after all that Gomez and Maceo had chasséd across the island from time to time, sometimes on one side and sometimes on another, and when they were said to be driven back into the eastern portion, whence they came, one bright morning within 10 miles of Habana there appeared a force of 15,000 men under Maceo and Gomez, and there were some 25,000 men in another portion of the island. Weyler was in Habana, and it is said was going to move to Matanzas, or to some other place, where perhaps it was safer.

I give an illustration of this warfare in the latest account of the war:

MACEO'S ARMY.

Outside the city the presence of the army of Maceo is overshadowing in its immediate importance even the sensational events which have upset all Spain, and alarm has followed which has caused the American question to take a second place temporarily.

Gomez and Maceo no sooner completed their march eastward through Matanzas, putting an end to all possibility of grinding by the few planters who were inclined to obey General Weyler's order, than the former took a position near the border of Matanzas and Santa Clara, and Maceo returned to Habana province. Maceo has brought back 12,000 cavalry. He has left all the wounded in the east, where there are improvised hospitals strongly protected. These 12,000 men are all armed, the majority of them with Mausers; and they of course carry the machete. They have plenty of ammunition, and besides being hardened through the series of almost daily encounters, they are under the following leaders who have come back with Maceo: Pedro Diaz, Nunez, Delgado, Castillo, Rabi, Quintuc Bandera, Rodriguez, Alvarez, Mestre Torres, and Betancourt.

GREAT POWER OF GOMEZ.

With Gomez, who is in a position to assist Maceo if necessary, are Serafin Sanchez, Angel Gerra, Lacret, Perez, Antonio Nunez, Alemann, and others, whose combined forces number about 15,000 mounted men. They are scattered within a day or two days' march from Gomez's main body, which numbers about 7,000. Gomez also has a sufficient quantity of ammunition to last through any operations that may be necessary for carrying out the present plans. The expedition on the unknown steamer which escaped from the cruiser Hernan Cortes in Matanzas Harbor last week has doubtless landed its cargo. The freedom with which Gomez and Maceo pushed their way eastward, despite the combined operations of the four divisions under Generals Linares and Aldecoa and Colonel Tort and Colonel Hernandez (and also General Nevarro until he was deprived of his command and sent back to Spain last Saturday as a penalty for his reverses), and also the return of Maceo with so large a force, explain the alarm in Habana and make it easy to understand the strength of the rebel position outside the city.

FREQUENT FIGHTS.

Eight encounters occurred yesterday witnin 15 miles of the city limits, in a line which would extend from the coast near Guanabacos, on the east, around to the coast on the west at a point but a short distance from Marianao. One of these fights, at Las Guacimas, where Colonel Figaro's command was engaged, was so near the city that 40 of the Spanish wounded were carried into Jesus del Monte, which is the eastern part of the city of Habana; and aid was sent out from there to other wounded who had been too seriously hurt to be brought in without conveyances. This was a part of General Linares's command, and at the same moment the main force was engaged with Castillo at a point near Managua, 12 miles from the city.

General Aldeson was fighting with 1,500 rebels in the Nazarene Hills, and at Bayamas, near San Felipe. Colonel Tort was engaged with another rebel division of 2,000, under Maceo and Maestre, at San Jose Las Vegas, and other engagements were in progress at Wajai, 10 miles out, and at Batabano, on the south coast, all within a few hours.

REBELS EAGER FOR BATTLE.

The rebels are now inviting battles. Their policy of avoiding contests has necessarily been changed by the nature of their campaign around the city. Even the Spanish reports do not say now that after each meeting the enemy has been dispersed. This regular announcement has been changed to a statement that they have taken another position at some particular point.

Mr. President, that is the condition of Cuba, and I do not understand how anyone with the blood of the patriots of the American Revolution running in his veins can not sympathize with those people and declare his sympathy for them, whatever may be the cost. They may be poor and ignorant and weak, as I have no doubt they are, but, after all, they are seeking for freedom, the highest aim of manhood.

I wish to read a portion of a letter from a gentleman in Boston. I read simply a paragraph from it, and shall not give his name. He states that "nearly all the better class of the inhabitants support the Government, and that the rebels are composed of the low, the reckless, and ignorant element." He says that they are utterly incapable of self-government. That is the sum and substance of his letter, and I shall not attempt to read it in detail.

This gentleman in writing from Boston gives a quotation from the letter of a correspondent of his in Cuba. I do not like the patronizing tone of the letter, which commences with the statement that the better class of the inhabitants support the Government; that is, the people living in towns, those who have plantations, are called "the better class of inhabitants." Well, they are in better circumstances, and in that respect they are better—better off—but when you deal with the patriotism of a country you do not often look to those who have more regard to the defense of property than the defense of public right. In such cases you must take the mass of the people, and the kind of people denounced here as low—low in estate, I suppose the writer means—reckless and ignorant; because those people are engaged in war against the Spanish Government they are not to be considered, but only the better classes.

Mr. President, that was not the feeling in the American Revolution. It was the common people of the American Revolution who carried on and waged war, and they were aided and assisted by the most intellectual and able men of the country.

Why are those people ignorant? Why is it that the whole population is denounced? We know that nearly all—nine-tenths of the population—are in the army or are represented in the army. Why, I ask, are they ignorant? Because for ages they have been denied the opportunities of schools and institutions of learning. Their system produces ignorance. But they are not ignorant entirely of all things. They know enough to fight for liberty and for freedom, and they have carried on that cause, more or less, for fifty years. In ten years they compelled Spain to spend $400,000,000 in order to put down the rebellion, and that caused or tended to cause her bankruptcy. I say now, when this class of men—all of them practically, the great body of the people—are engaged in warfare, it is not wise for the higher classes to sneer at them and talk about their ignorance and their recklessness. It would be better a good deal if the better classes there—if there are any there—should join in as the better classes of our people joined in the revolution led by George Washington, the greatest of all men.

I wish to say another thing. When I read from the Journal, of New York, General Weyler was spoken of as being present when certain atrocious and outrageous wrongs were committed upon men, women, and children. As I said before, I do not complain that the Spanish minister wrote his letter. I think he had a right to defend his country and his countrymen whether here or anywhere, before the people or in the Department of State. I do not believe in the narrow idea that a man may not defend his Government and people anywhere wherever he goes and in any community. But the Spanish minister went on and quoted the book which I referred to in my former remarks, and then he said that Weyler's name appeared nowhere in the book. But, sir, Weyler did not deny his participation in those events, and the paper declared that Weyler was present. I have not the book yet, as I have not been able to find it, but the Spanish minister seems to have found it, a book of thirty or forty pages, which he says is the book to which I referred. Whether it is or not I do not know. I leave that for the Journal, of New York, a very intelligent and influential paper, to find out.

There is another matter. Spain has no right to complain of us for granting to her insurgents belligerent rights, because I believe by the law of nations Spain did right when she gave to the Confederates, although perhaps too hastily, the rights of belligerents. At that time, in June, 1861, no single battle had been fought between the Confederate and the Union forces. The battle of Bull Run did not come for a month after this recognition. But on account of the occupation by the Confederates of a great body of our territory, including military posts and military stations, the Spanish Government might fairly say that there was such a sense of strength in the Confederate forces that they ought to be regarded as belligerents even before a single battle had been fought in the war.

I do not complain of that. But here Spain complains when we propose to declare belligerency after tens of thousands of men have fallen on either side in bloody warfare. I do not see how it can complain in any way whatever, directly or indirectly, if we recognize the insurgents as belligerents—these ignorant, feeble men whom they talk about. If ever there was a case for declaring the fact of the existence of war and that there are two sides of that war, waging with infernal ardor in the work of human destruction, it exists there. If war in its worst form in the dark ages of the world ever exceeded in atrocity the war that is going on in Cuba, I should like to know where to find the book to read of it.

Therefore, it is idle for Spain to complain that we recognize these rebels as belligerents and that we declare then what, perhaps, we can not truly entirely declare, that we will have strict neutrality. In actual fact, in warfare, under the laws of the United States, no citizen of this country, even after this act of ours is completed, could go to Cuba to help the insurgents unless we repeal the law. By strict statute we forbid American people from going to participate in the wars of other countries. We, therefore, do not intend, by anything that is in the resolution, to participate in that war unless actual warfare is made upon us after the passage of the resolution—actual war, not the displacement of consuls and the small student war of rushing to break in a few windows with stones. That is not war. But will Spain commence war against us for doing what she did with us in our troublous times, for doing what every nation is justified by the law of nations in doing, recognize belligerents, and then treat them with a fair and impartial neutrality? That is the first resolution and the main and material resolution. How any man with a patriotic feeling and a knowledge of all the surroundings, the circumstances which we have before us, can refuse to support the Government in that declaration I can not imagine.

Now, in regard to the second declaration, let us look and see what it is:

Resolved, That Congress deplores the destruction of life and property caused by the war now waging in that island, and believing that the only permanent solution of the contest, equally in the interests of Spain, the people of Cuba, and other nations, would be in the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba, it is the sense of Congress that the Government of the United States should use its good offices and friendly influence to that end.

What objection can there be to that resolution? We say that we—

Deplore the destruction of life and property—caused by the war now waging in that island, and believing that the only permanent solution of the contest, equally in the interests of Spain, the people of Cuba, and other nations, would be in the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba.

So we do—

What man is there, or woman either, in the broad extent of our country who would not indorse that declaration? Spain, in conducting her relations with her dependencies, has lost them one by one. She had at one time a greater possession of territory than even Russia, greater even than any other nation in the world. She had nearly all of South America, she had Mexico, and she had the islands; and she lost them one by one in pursuing the same line of policy that she has pursued in regard to the Cubans.

Sir, if Cuba did not lie in an isolated region, surrounded by water, only to be approached by a naval power and controlled by Spain mainly as a naval power, Cuba would have fallen like all the rest of the Spanish possessions; and I say in my place, I say as the general feeling of the American people, that this strange condition of a pretended possession or government so near our shores by which the rights of the poor and feeble and ignorant are totally disregarded, by which they are deprived of the right of suffrage, deprived of liberty, and even of the privilege of being taught in the common schools or anywhere else, can not stand much longer. Grant said so in his time, and so did Fish and others, and everyone who has been familiar with Spanish affairs has expected the good time to come when this state of affairs would cease. I say the time has come when the American people should openly and plainly declare their detestation of such horrors, their detestation of such tyranny, and, if necessary, I should be willing to go further and say that it shall end.

Mr. President, as to the third clause of the resolution, it has been the subject of construction by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. I am not here to discuss questions of grammar or of syntax or of parsing. I say that that resolution upon its face seems to me a fair resolution, and the only thing about it which I do not like is its reference to the interests of property. I wish the House of Representatives had left that out. That I disagreed to to some extent, but we thought on the whole, in order to close the matter up, we would accept it. I will read that clause:

Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European Governments and their colonies on this continent; but from the very close relations between the people of the United States and those of Cuba—

That is all right—

in consequence of its proximity—

That is all right—

and the extent of the commerce between the two peoples—

That ought not to be there—

the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens by intervention, if necessary.

Now, I do not like this resolution in that particular, but the general meaning and substance of it are true and correct. We have larger interests in Cuba than we have in all South America. Our importations from Cuba amount to nearly $100,000,000. Our exportations last year amounted to $28,000,000. Our people who are down there are the owners of land. They have sugar estates; they have large interests there. That island is close to us in our business relations, but these would not justify war. The fact is that the business done by our citizens in Cuba ought not to and have not led to this controversy, in my judgment. I really believe, and in this presence I can say, that if the Senate dislikes this particular language, which seems to point at a money consideration to us by the independence of Cuba, I have no doubt the other House would promptly respond to any change in that respect. But in substance it is true. The only trouble is it is better not always to say the truth. It is better not always to speak of money and property and property interests when the rights of millions of people are involved. They are the subjects to be considered, and the lesser subjects are to be departed from.

Mr. President, I think I have now said all I care to say in this rather informal way. There are many other things which I might have said, but I do not wish to trespass upon the time of my friend the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. It is my firm conviction that it is the duty of Congress specifically and in language about which there can be no difference of construction, to declare that there is a war prevailing in Cuba, a terrible, desolating war, and that we will recognize the belligerents and deal with them impartially. We will not give a preference to the Spanish ship loaded with guns for Spanish soldiers. We will not give the Spaniards the great advantage of our commerce, or our ports, of our police, and deny those privileges to these men who are fighting for their liberty. That is what we will not do. That is what this declaration is. We say we will recognize them as belligerents, having an equal claim for our forbearance.

Now, sir, in conclusion I wish to state that I do not anticipate, and I do not believe, there will be war growing out of this matter. There is no occasion for war. We have done nothing that we ought not to have done, but we have been very slow in doing what we ought to have done. We might have brought to the relief of the Cubans without violating international law various forms of aid. We have refused to do it. We treat these poor people who are fighting for their liberty much less courteously than we do those who are fighting against them. We respect the Spaniards and the Spanish nation. They are a proud and noble people. Their history is worthy of consideration. Four centuries ago they were the most powerful nation in Europe. They commanded not only the old peninsula of Spain, but they commanded also a large portion of what is now Holland, the Netherlands, and Germany. But they in all their wars, in all their controversies, have exhibited a degree of violence that never was recognized as proper by the English-speaking people. They fought with a bitterness that never has been copied on almost any other than Spanish soil and in any other almost than a Spanish controversy. They therefore have lost their high station among the nations of Europe.

I trust, however, that the time is not far distant when the new blood in that great old country will be brought to the front and when Spain will become the second Republic of Europe. The tendency is that way, the feeling is that way, and there are signs which I see that a large body of the people of Spain hope that Cuba will be made free. If Spain should renew the treaty of Campos of 1878 and faithfully observe it, the people of Cuba would eagerly accept such terms. In my judgment this war ought not to end it; ought to continue until the Cubans attain their freedom against Spanish oppression, until they are armed with home rule and have a power to make law for themselves. If that be done, then all America is republic, for Canada to-day is as much a republic as is the United States of America. It is held to the mother country only by ties of friendship and auld lang syne. Every part of this great hemisphere discovered by Columbus is destined to be the place where free institutions will develop to the very uttermost, and from which they will be extended, I trust, to all the nations of the world. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from North Carolina indulge me for a moment?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely desire to take the floor on the resolution before it passes from the consideration of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, I fully appreciate the nature of my task in undertaking to reply to the very able and exhaustive speech delivered by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE.]

The question presented to us is one which should command our earnest and impartial consideration. Each member of this body in dealing with this question occupies the position of a sworn juror whose duty it is to hear and determine the case upon its merits. In order to arrive at a correct conclusion of the whole matter it is necessary for us to acquaint ourselves with the facts in the case and apply the law in accordance with the constitution of the State of Delaware.

It appears from the pleadings in the case that at the organization of the senate of the State of Delaware William T. Watson was elected speaker of that body, and continued in the discharge of his official duties as speaker of the senate until the 9th day of April, 1895, the day following that on which Joshua H. Marvil, governor of the State, died. The general assembly, among other things, was charged with the duty of electing a Senator of the United States for the constitutional term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1895, and, having failed to elect a Senator on the second Tuesday after the meeting of the legislature, convened in joint assembly on the next day, being the 16th day of January, in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," approved on the 25th day of July, 1866, and proceeded to vote for a United States Senator. No one having been elected to the office of Senator that day, the general assembly, pursuant to the provision of said act, convened in joint assembly on the following and each succeeding day of the session until and including Thursday, the 9th day of May.

It is admitted that on the 9th day of April, as soon as the joint assembly of the two houses had separated, Mr. Watson, the speaker of the senate, took the official oaths prescribed for the governor of the State of Delaware; that he at once entered upon the discharge of his duties of office and assumed the functions of governor; that from the date that he qualified as governor until the final joint assembly of the two houses on the 9th day of May Governor Watson did not assume to act as senator, nor did he take any part in the deliberations of the senate nor of the joint assembly. It further appears that Governor Watson, on the 9th day of May, entered the final joint assembly and assumed the right to vote for a United States Senator. At the final joint assembly twenty-eight ballots were had for United States Senator, and the vote upon every ballot was as follows:

Henry A. Du Pont, 15 votes; Edward Ridgley, 10 votes; James E. Addicks, 4 votes; Ebe W. Tunnel, 1 vote.

It is contended that Governor Watson had no authority at that time to exercise the functions of a senator of the State of Delaware, and that his vote cast for Edward Ridgley was a nullity; and that only 29 votes were legally cast, of which Henry A. Du Pont received 15, being a clear majority of all legal votes cast; and that Mr. Du Pont was duly elected United States Senator and is entitled to a seat in this body.

Before entering upon a discussion of this case, I beg leave to say that I have read and carefully considered the very able arguments presented by both sides and that I have arrived at the conclusion that Mr. Du Pont did, on the 9th day of May, as aforesaid, receive a majority of the votes cast by those who legally constituted the joint assembly of the State of Delaware at that time. In forming this opinion, I have been guided by what I conceive to be a proper construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware. I find on examination of the constitution of that State that the second article of the constitution contains the following section:

SEC. 12. No person concerned in any army or navy contract, no member of Congress, nor any person holding any office under this State or of the United States, except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia holding no disqualifying office, shall, during his continuance in Congress or in office, be a senator or representative.

Here we have a positive declaration that no person during his continuance in the office of governor of Delaware shall be a senator. If this section means anything, it is that the person holding or exercising the office of governor of that State is absolutely disqualified from exercising the functions of senator. I take it that it will hardly be contended by those who claim that Mr. Du Pont was not legally elected that had Gov. Watson been elected to the position of governor and senator both at the same time, that in the face of this provision in the constitution he would have been permitted to hold the office of governor and at the same time be a senator or representative. I presume no one will contend that he could have qualified and exercised the functions of both offices at the same time. That being so, we should remember the well-settled principle of law that no one will be permitted to indirectly do that which he can not directly do. Those who take the position that Governor Watson on that occasion had the authority to vote as senator and exercise the functions of the office of senator are asking us to decide that the governor by indirection could do that which he could not directly do. This is such a flagrant and utter disregard of all the rules of construction with which I am acquainted that I am fully persuaded that such an argument will not influence members of this body in deciding a grave question like the one under consideration.

The third article of the Delaware constitution contains the following provision:

SEC. 5. No member of Congress nor person holding any office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of governor.

It is plain to my mind that the effect of this section is to declare that no person shall exercise the office of governor while holding the office of senator or representative. There can be no conflict between this section of the Delaware constitution, which declares that—

No member of Congress or person holding any office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of governor—

And the first clause of section 14 of the article, which declares that—

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people be duly qualified.

These two clauses, it may be claimed, are susceptible of such a construction as would make them positively repugnant; for instance, such a construction as will make one mean that the senator who happens to be speaker of the senate when the governor dies shall thereupon become governor, and the other an express declaration that no senator shall become governor. I take the position that these provisions of the constitution are susceptible of another construction, which completely reconciles them. When we consider them together and construe them as a whole, as it is our duty to do, the reasonable and proper construction of these provisions is that the speaker of the senate shall become governor upon the death of the governor chosen by the people, and in so doing he vacates the office of senator.

According to the well-settled rules of the common law, the valid acceptance of one office by the person already holding another and an incompatible office vacates the former as effectually as an actual surrender of it. In fact, it has always been regarded as an abdication, and therefore a quasi resignation. I find among the decisions of the supreme court of my State several cases which unquestionably recognize the principle of the common law which forbade the same person from holding incompatible offices.

I call attention to the case in the matter of J. G. Martin, decided in 62 North Carolina, page 153, which expressly decides that the acceptance of one office by a person already holding an incompatible office vacates the former. I quote the following portion of the case in point in order that this body may have the benefit of the views of our supreme court relative to this question.

This is a case which occurred during the late war, when my distinguished predecessor was governor of our State. The question arose as to whether or not General Martin, who was then holding the office of adjutant-general, could at the same time occupy the office of brigadier-general of the Confederate States.

An agreed case was submitted to the supreme court of North Carolina, and the supreme court of that State, presided over by Chief Justice Pearson, one among the most eminent common-law lawyers of this conntry, decided that in that case the very moment he accepted the office of brigadier-general in the Confederate States the office of adjutant-general became vacant, and that Governor Vance had the right to appoint a successor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, NORTH CAROLINA,
Raleigh, March 2, 1863.

DEAR SIR: You are aware that the legislature, by a joint resolution, declared the office of adjutant-general vacant, by reason of the incumbent's having accepted an incompatible office under the Confederate States government, and that by a subsequent act the appointment was conferred upon the governor.

General Martin, the present incumbent, having declared his intention of testing the legality of this action of the legislature by an appeal to the courts, I am placed in a position rather embarrassing. To avoid the somewhat unpleasant spectacle of a lawsuit for the possession of an office, confidential in its relation to myself, and very important to the public at this time, I have concluded, with the consent of General Martin, to make a case and ask the opinion of the supreme court immediately thereon.

With this view I should be greatly obliged, and I have no doubt the public interest would also be subserved, if you would have the kindness to call the court together and give its opinion upon the question. As early a day as possible is respectfully requested.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant, Z. B. VANCE.

Hon. R. M. PEARSON,
Chief Justice of North Carolina.

OPINION OF THE JUDGES—IN THE MATTER OF THE ADJUTANT-GENERALSHIP.

At the request of his excellency Governor Vance and General Martin, the judges of the supreme court have heard a full argument on the questions of law presented by the facts set out in "the case agreed," and certify their opinion to be that the office of the brigadier-general under the Confederate States is incompatible with the office of adjutant-general under the State of North Carolina; and that on the facts stated "the office of adjutant-general is vacant, and the governor may lawfully proceed to appoint thereto."

It is proper to state that in giving this opinion we do not act as a court, but merely as judges of the court, and have treated the matter in the same light and with the same full consideration as if the case had been regularly before the court upon a proceeding appropriate to present the question.

We were induced to take this action, and felt not only at liberty to do so, but conceived it was in some measure our duty thus to aid a coordinate department of the Government, because we were informed by his excellency the governor that the subject would in that way be relieved from all further embarrassment; and that the public interest required that it should be adjusted sooner than it could be done by the regular mode of proceeding in court, particularly as the court now holds but one term during the year. (Berry vs. Waddell, 9 Iredell, 318, appendix.)

WILL. H. BATTLE, J. S. C.
M. E. MANLY, J. S. C.

RALEIGH, March 11, 1863.

In this case it was contended by the counsel for General Martin that he only received a salary for the discharge of the duties of one of the offices and that therefore he could not be said to be holding two offices that were incompatible, but it seems that the court was of opinion that his refusal to receive the salary of one of two incompatible offices in law could not change the matter or diminish the duties of either office and that his obligation was as great to discharge the duties of the office for which pay was not received as the one for which a salary was accepted.

I am not informed as to whether Governor Watson drew the salary incident to both the offices of senator and governor, but I am inclined to the opinion that he did not, inasmuch as he rendered no service as senator after his qualification as governor save and except the pretended service on the day heretofore mentioned. Mechem's Treatise on the Law of Public Offices and Officers, section 420, in discussing the effect of accepting incompatible offices, says:

It is a well-settled rule of the common law that he who while occupying one office accepts another incompatible with the first, ipso facto absolutely vacates the first office and his title is thereby terminated without any other act or proceeding. (Millard vs. Thatcher, 2 T. R., 81; Rex vs. Patteson, 4 B. and Ad., 9; Rex vs. Hughes, 5 B. and C., 886.)

I understand the Senators on the other side to take the position that it must affirmatively appear to this body that there was an adjudication of the fact by the senate of the State of Delaware that the office was vacant before we can find that it was vacant. In this decision it is expressly decided to be to the contrary, that no further proceeding is necessary in order to vacate the first office held by the party who takes the second. I proceed with the opinion:

That the second office is inferior to the first does not affect the rule. (Millard vs. Thatcher, 2 T. R., 81.) And even though the title to the second office fail, as where the election was void, the rule is still the same, nor can the officer then regain possession of his former office to which another has been appointed or elected. (Rex vs. Hughes, 5 B. & C., 886.)

I cite along with these different propositions the decisions of the different States sustaining the view.

Mr. GRAY. You are reading from Mechem.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I am reading from Mechem, but at the same time I am citing as I go along, as will appear in my speech in the RECORD, the authorities which sustain each view that he entertains on that question.

In this connection I wish to call attention to the case of Bryan vs. Cattell (15 Iowa, 550), in which the court said:

Our opinion is that we are not confined to the statutory clauses or events in determining whether a vacancy exists. If a party accepts another office which, within the meaning of the law and cases, is incompatible with that which he holds, we have no doubt that the first one would become vacant. Thus, as is well said by the appellant, if the judge of a district court should accept a seat upon this bench, a vacancy would be created in the first office; and yet the statute certainly does not, in terms, cover such a case. So if the auditor of state should take the office of treasurer, and many other cases that might be named.

It seems to me that this opinion, together with the other opinions which I have quoted, is conclusive. The general trend of the decisions is to the effect that if a party accepts another office which, within the meaning of the law, is incompatible with that which he holds, the first one becomes vacant. And, as an additional reason why Governor Watson could not exercise the functions of the office of governor and senator at the same time, I submit that it is a direct violation of the fundamental principles of the constitutions of the several States to blend the functions of legislative and executive offices.

It would be as much a violation of the principles of the constitutions of the various States to blend the functions of the executive and the judiciary. In either instance it would be a clear, plain, unquestioned violation of the principles on which the constitutions of the various States of this Union are formed and based.

As an evidence of this fact, the constitution of almost every State in the Union contains an express provision that no member of Congress or other person holding any other office under the State or United States shall during his continuance in Congress or in office be a senator or representative, and the very fact that Governor Watson never at any other time during his incumbency as governor assumed to act as senator makes it clear to my mind that he so understood the constitution of his State.

Governor Watson lived in the State, he had taken the oath to execute the laws of his State, and if we take his conduct on that occasion as a criterion we are forced to the conclusion that the construction given by Governor Watson between the period of the 9th of April and the 9th of May was the correct construction of the constitution of that State. If we should decide that Governor Watson had the right under the constitution of Delaware to act as senator during his continuance in office as governor it would amount to the declaration on our part that the section of the constitution of Delaware which provides that—

No person concerned in any army or navy contract, or member of Congress, nor any person holding any office under this State, or of the United States, except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia, holding no disqualifying office, shall, during his continuance in Congress or in office, be a senator or representative—is meaningless and can in no emergency be construed in such a manner as to prohibit one from holding both a legislative and executive office in that State at the same time. Why was it that the framers of the constitution inserted this provision as a part of the constitution? If it means anything, it certainly means that they were determined to forever keep separate and distinct the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of that State. This spirit is infused and ingrafted into almost every State constitution in the United States.

Mr. President, I wish to read from a case which is reported in 45 Missouri, The State, ex rel. James W. Owens, petitioner, vs. Dan M. Draper, State auditor, respondent, page 356. I will state before I read this opinion that they had a provision in their constitution in the State of Missouri that no one exercising or holding a State office shall at the same time hold an office in the general assembly. I am not going to read the opinion which relates to the construction of that section, but I am going to read the opinion bearing upon the construction of the common-law doctrine vacating an office where an incompatible office is accepted. Among other things, the court said:

The case is submitted on the pleadings, and they show that while Owens was a judge of the circuit court he was elected a representative to the legislature, qualified, took his seat, and performed the duties and functions of that office. There does not appear to have been any resignation of the judgeship, and the question is whether he could legally hold the two offices and receive the pay appertaining to both at the same time. There has never been any doubt about the principle—

Says Judge Wagner, who rendered the opinion—

so far as I am advised, that at common law, if a party accepts another office which is incompatible with the one he holds, the first one would become vacant.

Suppose Owens—

That is, the petitioner—

instead of being elected to the legislature had been elected to a seat on this bench, and had qualified and entered on the discharge of its duties. It is perfectly clear to my mind that his seat on the circuit bench would have been thereby vacated.

Or if the auditor should be elected treasurer, or the attorney-general secretary of state, their acceptance of the latter offices would necessarily vacate their former ones. Besides the common-law rule, the State government is divided into separate and distinct branches or departments, the officers of each having separate and independent functions to perform.

Just as they had in this case. There was the executive of the State of Delaware with his separate, distinct, and independent functions to perform; there was the State senate of Delaware with its separate, distinct, and independent functions to perform.

It was designed that they should be distinguished and divided by a line of demarkation, and that one should not trench upon the other.

This is a principle which our lawmakers have ever kept in view in the past and one which we as such are compelled, under our oaths, to preserve and enforce whenever and wherever we come in contact with it in the discharge of our official duties.

It is absurd to say that Governor Watson was able to discharge the duties at all times of governor and senator as well when each office was replete with pressing duties as when the duties were easy and infrequent, and this of itself brings the case within the rule established by the common law as a test when offices are incompatible. In reply to this argument, we are met with the statement from the other side that in all these cases there is no vacancy until there is an adjudication of the fact by some tribunal of competent jurisdiction. When a party holding an office accepts another which is incompatible, by operation of law the former office becomes vacant the moment he assumes and qualifies for the discharge of the duties of the second office. It is a right which determines upon the happening of a contingency, and any attempted adjudication on the part of any tribunal can in no wise affect the status of the case.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana in his very able and ingenuous argument contended that Governor Watson inherited the office and could not decline it, neither could he accept it. That was his exact language, as I remember it. "He was simply exercising it." This statement of itself shows the inconsistency of the position assumed by those who oppose Mr. Du Pont's claim. The Senator would have us believe that Governor Watson was foreordained from the beginning of the world to exercise the office of governor, and there was no means of escape left open to him in this case. That is the logic and outcome of his proposition. A Senator near me suggests that he is a Presbyterian.

Mr. THURSTON. And therefore in harmony with the Administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes.

The more reasonable construction of the section in question is that the term "speaker of the senate" is used for the purpose of designation, and that only. If it is, as contended by the distinguished Senator, that the exercise of the office of governor by Senator Watson was "simply one of his duties as speaker of the senate," why was it necessary that he should take the pains to take the oath of office as prescribed by the constitution of Delaware to be taken by the governor who had been elected by the people before he could assume the duties of office? If his position is the correct position, he had nothing to do but to walk in and take up the reins of government of Delaware and exercise the duties of that office, because he was speaker of the senate. This man did not do that. This man took the identical oath that was taken by his predecessor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He took three.

Mr. PRITCHARD. As is suggested by our honorable chairman, he not only took one, but he took three. He was well sworn in, if I may make the suggestion.

If the Senator's position is the correct one, the office came to him as an inheritance comes to an heir. He was unfortunate in his illustration, inasmuch as the cases are not analogous. The moment the ancestor dies the property instantly vests in the heir and he can do nothing to add to or change the title to the property he inherits, but with Governor Watson it was entirely different. On the death of the governor of Delaware he had the right to qualify as governor and exercise the functions of the executive of that

State, but it will not be seriously contended that he could have exercised the office of governor without taking the prescribed oaths and being inducted into office in like manner as his predecessor, who was elected, when elected, by the people. This theory of the Senator is a beautiful one and interesting to contemplate, but has no application whatever to the case under consideration.

The distinguished Senator also said: "We have never heard of any great calamity which has befallen the people of Delaware in consequence of the speaker of the senate exercising this right." I agree that prior to this unwarranted assumption on the part of Governor Watson it has never resulted in a "great calamity" to the people of that State. It must be said, greatly to the credit of his predecessors, who had theretofore exercised similar functions, that no one of them ever attempted to violate the plain provisions of the constitution which they had sworn to support. The distinguished Senator, in reply to a question from the Senator from Oregon, with much emphasis declared, "That Governor Watson's predecessors had acted as senator while exercising the office of governor," but when we refer to the record it appears that no such precedent is to be found in the legislative history of Delaware, and I challenge Senators who differ from me to show a single instance in the records of the legislature of Delaware wherein a speaker of the senate, while exercising the office of governor, ever attempted even to participate in the legislative proceedings.

While I contend that when Governor Watson qualified as governor he absolutely abdicated the office of senator and had no power, under the provisions of the constitution of Delaware, to take it up again at his will and resume the functions incident thereto, at the same time I am willing to admit for argument's sake that for the time being his functions as senator were temporarily suspended. Take it for granted that this is the correct position; I then insist that he had no right to assume or attempt to exercise his functions as senator during the time he exercised the office of governor. I have examined with great care the precedents in the several States where they have provisions in their constitutions similar to that of the State of Delaware, and in no instance have I found a case where a governor during his continuance in office as governor attempted to exercise his functions as senator. It is plain to my mind that in all the States where there are precedents it is the consensus of opinion of the judicial authorities as well as the legislative branches that it would be a violation of the fundamental principles underlying the constitutions of these several States to permit an individual while acting as governor to participate in the proceedings of the legislature.

Mr. GRAY. On what ground does the Senator base that opinion?

Mr. PRITCHARD. On the ground that in every constitution to be found in every State of the United States it is recognized in the bill of rights that the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments ought to be kept forever separate and distinct. That is the ground I put it upon. That is the ground on which we rest our case. It is a violation of the fundamental principles of free government to blend the legislative and executive functions of a State.

It is also insisted by the Senator from Indiana that Governor Watson was never called "governor." I am not going to undertake to follow the distinguished Senator in all his meanderings, but I do want to follow a few propositions laid down by him. I was surprised at the statement that Governor Watson was never called "governor," inasmuch as the journals furnish an abundance of evidence to show that he was designated as governor of the State. This argument only illustrates the fact that my distinguished friend realizes the weakness of his cause. The very fact that the distinguished Senator from Indiana made this argument convinces me that it is his opinion that if it should appear to this body that Watson was recognized as governor of the State of Delaware that it would be an admission that would clearly make the two offices incompatible at common law.

He knew full well the force of that admission; he knew that once this body determined the fact to be that Watson was recognized as the governor of the State of Delaware, under the common-law doctrine, he vacated the office of senator. That very fact would settle the question.

The honorable Senator from Indiana as a distinguished lawyer has few superiors in this country, and no one appreciates more fully than he does the bearing it would have on this case in the event we should find he was governor, and especially that the legislature recognized him as governor of the State. The journal of the senate shows the fact to be that Governor Watson transmitted messages to that body as governor and performed other duties incident to the office of governor.

As has been suggested by the honorable chairman of the committee, the records and the journal of the senate of Delaware show that Senator Watson was sworn in as governor of the State of Delaware. How much more proof do you want that he was the governor of that State? How much more proof are we required to produce in the case to convince these Senators that he was actually governor? He did everything that his predecessor had done, he exercised every function that his predecessor had exercised. Now, wherein does he differ, and in what respect does he differ, in exercising those functions from his predecessor, who had died?

It is stated by those who contend that Mr. Du Pont is not entitled to a seat in this body that "the constitution of Delaware not only does not forbid, but it expressly authorizes the speaker of the senate, while holding that office, to exercise the office of governor."

As heretofore stated, this position can not be maintained in the light of the provision of the constitution of Delaware. I have already quoted the two provisions of the constitution of Delaware which in plain terms make the offices of senator and governor in all cases incompatible, and in addition thereto is the well-grounded principle of common law which obtains in this and similar cases. It is the duty of the executive of the State of Delaware to execute the law, and in order to faithfully discharge his duties as such he should be in constant attendance at the executive office, and it is absurd to say that he can at one and the same time be present in the governor's office, and faithfully discharge his duties as such, and participate in the proceedings of the legislature. Among other things, the constitution of Delaware requires that the governor—

> Shall, from time to time, give the general assembly information of affairs concerning the State, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge expedient.

That is the express language of the constitution of Delaware.

If we adopt the theory that while acting as governor he could legally act as senator, we are then placed in the attitude of admitting that he would have the right as governor to recommend the enactment of a certain law and then be permitted to enter the senate chamber, reenforced with the power of governor of the State, and then not only would he exert the influence of senator, but would bring the almost irresistible power of the executive to bear in securing the enactment of any pet measure that he might see fit to advocate.

This one statement of the case within itself clearly demonstrates to my mind that these two offices are incompatible under the common law. It would be giving him as senator such power and influence as was never intended to be exercised by one individual in the legislative halls of this country. This statement of the case within itself is a sufficient reason for the opinion that the framers of the constitution of the State of Delaware never intended to permit a person during the time he occupied the office of governor to participate in the proceedings of the legislature, and I find no instance in the State of Delaware, nor in any other State in this Union, where the governor of the State has acted in the dual capacity of a governor and a senator at the same time.

In order to maintain the position that Mr. Watson had the right to exercise the office of governor while holding the office of senator the distinguished Senators who are of that opinion are forced to take the position that the words "exercise the office of governor" do not mean that be shall be governor of the State for the time being, but that he is simply a figurehead without the functions of a real governor. They ask us to believe that he had full power to use the seal of office and sign official documents as governor without any qualification whatever, and in the next breath we are gravely informed that he was not governor of the State of Delaware within the meaning of the constitution of that State.

May I ask them in what sense he was not the governor of the State of Delaware at the time that he assumed to vote as senator? Was he not required to take the same oath when he entered upon the discharge of his duties as he would have been required to take had he been elected by the people? Was he not required to discharge each and every duty incident to the office of governor? It is clear to my mind that if the construction insisted upon by the Senators who oppose Mr. Du Pont's claim be a correct one, then the people of the district assumed to be represented by Governor Watson have been deprived of their rights under the constitution. His duties were so pressing that for a whole month he could not find time to repair to the senate chamber and look after the interests of his constituents. The constitution of that State expressly provides:

> There shall be three senators chosen in each county. Where a greater number of senators shall by the general assembly be adjudged necessary, two-thirds of each branch concurring, they may by law make provision for increasing their number; but the number of senators shall never be greater than one-half or less than one-third of the number of representatives.

In the face of this provision that each county shall have a certain number of representatives in the senate, it is unreasonable to say that in the event a senator should succeed to the office of governor that then the county which he happened to represent should not have an equal number of votes with the other counties in the legislature as contemplated by the constitution. The question of representation in a legislative body is one in which the public is interested, and one about which there should be no uncertainty. It is not a matter which should be determined by the officeholder, and should be one about which there could be no cavil or misunderstanding. In the case of Stubbs vs. Lee, in 64 Me., page 195, Chief Justice Appleton said:

> Where one has two incompatible offices, both can not be retained. The public has a right to know which is held and which is surrendered. It should not be left to chance or to the uncertain and fluctuating whim of the office-holder to determine. The general rule, therefore, that the acceptance of and qualification for an office incompatible with the one then held is a resignation of the former is one certain and reliable, as well as one indispensable for the protection of the public.

This decision is based upon the principle that the rights of the public are not to be infringed upon by individuals who, like Governor Watson, in their greed would attempt to monopolize more than one office. Suppose that on the day that Governor Watson qualified as governor the people of his district had demanded the right to elect a senator to fill the vacancy in the senate occasioned by his absence.

It was well known then to the people of Delaware that there would be no vacancy so far as he was concerned; that the vacancy would not be filled until the next general election in that State. He had absented himself from that body. Now, suppose that they should have made application to fill the vacancy occasioned by his absence, will it be contended that such a right could have been successfully resisted by Governor Watson? I take it that as a matter of right they would have been entitled to elect a Senator to represent them, as contemplated by their constitution; hence the reason for the law which provides that on the acceptance of an incompatible office the public has the right to know which is held and which is surrendered, and that the determination of the question should not be left to the officeholder to determine.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator will allow me a question at that point, without interference, but to go right along in the line of his argument, suppose the disability of the governor had been simply a case of illness, rheumatism, paralysis, pneumonia, or anything of that kind, which would have incapacitated him from performing the duties of the office of governor, and that during his disability it had been necessary to bring the constitutional provision into play and for the speaker of the senate to exercise the office of governor, in that case would a vacancy have occurred?

Mr. PRITCHARD. There would have been no permanent vacancy in that instance as contemplated by the constitution of Delaware. The case now before us is entirely different from the one the Senator suggests to me. He suggests a question of sickness, which may last for a day or for a week; but the case we have before us is not that kind of a case. We have a case in which there is a vacancy which we know will exist until the next general election of the State of Delaware, and we know the further fact that the legislature will have adjourned before that election occurs.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. GRAY. Has the Senator noticed that in the clause which provides for the filling of the office of governor in case of a vacancy the language is something like this—I have not the provision before me—in case of the death or disability of the governor, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor is elected by the people and duly qualified; thereby making no distinction between a vacancy happening by death and a temporary vacancy occasioned by disability. In each of these cases the same provision for filling the vacancy is made by the constitution.

Mr. PLATT. Is the word "disability" or "inability"?

Mr. PRITCHARD. "Inability."

Mr. GRAY. I was not quoting exactly, not having the constitution before me.

Mr. PLATT. There is a difference between the two words.

Mr. PRITCHARD. As I have observed, if that be the case, there can be no question whatever about Mr. Du Pont's right to a seat in this body, because, as I understand the distinguished Senator, he says that it means that there is an absolute vacancy running all the way up to an election of governor by the people of that State.

Mr. THURSTON. The constitution provides the manner in which the legislature itself shall ascertain and declare the inability, if it be a vacancy caused by inability. The constitution of Delaware provides that the senate of Delaware may declare, by a two-thirds vote, if I remember the provision rightly, or at least may declare, when the office is vacant by reason of inability.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will read the provision. It is contained in section 14 of Article III, and is as follows:

> The governor shall not be removed from his office for inability but with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

That is the article to which the Senator referred.

Mr. GRAY. That does not modify the effect of the clause declaring the vacancy.

Mr. THURSTON. It simply emphasizes it and makes it more clear.

Mr. PRITCHARD. The Senator from Indiana pokes fun at the distinguished Senator from Oregon because he used the word "refrain" in connection with the conduct of Governor Watson, and spends considerable time in seriously contending before this body that the word "refrain," as used in this connection, absolutely settles this whole question; that it is an admission on the part of our distinguished chairman which sweeps away every vestige of hope that now lingers in the mind of Mr. Du Pont. Now, I do not think the Senator from Oregon has used such a bad word after all. The word "refrain," among other things, means "to keep from action or interference." That is to say that Governor Watson had no right to interfere with the action of the legislature while exercising the office of governor. I can not imagine a better word that the Senator from Oregon could have used in this connection.

I am surprised that the distinguished Senator from Indiana should use such an argument for the purpose of influencing votes on a grave question in the Senate of the United States. The Senator from Oregon has stated the position of the committee so plainly that "he who runs may read," and any attempt to befog the question will not avail Senators who happen to be at a loss for a satisfactory argument to sustain their views.

It is also contended that all who voted for United States Senator in joint assembly at Dover on the 9th day of May, 1895, had been adjudged by their respective houses entitled to their seats therein and that the judgment of the two houses of the legislature is conclusive on the Senate of the United States. This is an unwarranted conclusion, and one that is not sustained by the facts. There is no record which tends to establish the fact that after Governor Watson qualified as governor he was adjudged to be entitled to a seat in the Senate. I fail to find in any of the records in this case a single sentence which would indicate any action on the part of the senate of Delaware adjudging the fact to be that Governor Watson was entitled to a seat in that body.

The joint assembly did not have the right to pass upon the title of Governor Watson to a seat in the senate. The senate alone had the right to say who were entitled to membership in their body, and therefore the fact that he was permitted to participate in the proceedings of the joint assembly proves nothing, because the first essential element of a judgment is that the body rendering judgment should have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. That is familiar law and can not be successfully controverted.

The senate of Delaware has neither actually nor constructively adjudged that Governor Watson had the power to exercise the office of senator since the date of his qualification as governor of that State. That the United States Senate has the power under the Constitution to judge of the qualification of its own members, as well as the manner of their election, no one will controvert. Therefore it is highly important that we should pass upon the question as to whether Mr. Du Pont was duly elected to a seat in this body, and in determining this question the inquiry naturally arises as to whether or not the legislature which elected him was constituted in accordance with the provision of the constitution of the State of Delaware. If it should appear to us that the legislature of Delaware had exceeded the limits prescribed by the constitution of that State, I had assumed that no one would seriously contend that we should be bound by its action.

That the legislature of that State had the power to judge of the election and qualifications of its members can not be denied, but it is equally true that in doing so due regard should be had for the provisions of the constitution of that State. The legislature of that State had full power to act so long as no principle of the constitution of the State was violated; but the moment the legislature exceeded the authority granted by the constitution in admitting the vote of an intruder to be counted, who was not in law a member of that body, then an issue was raised as to whether or not they were acting within the limit of their constitutional power and authority, and once such issue is raised there can be no doubt about the jurisdiction of this body to investigate their action in that particular.

The power thus conferred upon the senate of Delaware by the constitution of that State, like that conferred upon the Senate of the United States by the Federal Constitution, is the power to admit or reject the claimant who is or is not entitled to a seat, which is, under the State constitution, subject to occupation by somebody. It is not the power to admit a claimant to a seat which is subject to occupation by nobody. Upon the apportionment of that State in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, the senate is composed of 9 senators. This being the case, suppose that instead of the record disclosing the fact that 9 Senators were present and participating in the joint assembly it should appear that 12 senators participated in the proceedings of that body, will anyone contend that in that event this body would be precluded from investigating the matter and deciding in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of that State, that only 9 were the properly constituted number of that body and entitled to vote for a United States Senator? Suppose that instead of Governor Watson appearing on the 9th day of May in the joint assembly that the secretary of state had appeared and participated in the proceedings of the joint assembly and cast a vote for United States Senator, are we to adopt the theory that in such a contingency this body would be bound by the action of the joint assembly of Delaware in permitting him to vote?

I was startled yesterday to hear the distinguished Senator from Indiana lay down the proposition, if it should appear to this body that Governor Watson had died, and that another individual, an interloper, should have appeared there, assuming to be Governor Watson, and they had admitted an interloper, who had never been elected, who had no right there, who was an intruder, that that judgment of the legislature would be conclusive upon this body. I submit that that one statement within itself shows the absurdity of the proposition attempted to be maintained by the distinguished Senators on the other side of this case.

If we are to be governed by such a rule as this, then the members of this body are powerless to pass upon the qualifications of its members. Suppose there had been two houses; suppose there had been two senates of the State of Delaware and two joint assemblies; if the proposition advocated by the distinguished Senator from Indiana is correct, then we would be powerless to investigate as to which house was the proper assembly to be represented here, and as to which house represented a republican form of government in the State of Delaware.

The case which we have before us is in all respects as strong as the cases I have supposed by way of illustration. The moment that Senator Watson qualified as governor of the State of Delaware the office of senator which he had theretofore held became vacant and no one could legally exercise the functions of the office which he had vacated until there had been an election held and the vacancy filled in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware. Such being the case, we are forced to the inevitable conclusion that the legally constituted number of senators of the State of Delaware on the 9th day of May in consequence of this vacancy was only 8, and therefore the joint assembly was composed of 29 members instead of 30 had there been no such vacancy.

The action of Governor Watson on the 9th day of May when he pretended to participate as a member in the proceedings of the joint assembly of Delaware was simply that of an intruder, without the slightest semblance of authority for his conduct, and therefore his vote was a nullity. He was clothed with no more authority or power to act as senator on that occasion than that of any private citizen of the State of Delaware. We certainly have the right to say that a private citizen would have had no authority to act on that occasion.

In the light of the facts in this case, construed according to the constitution of the State of Delaware, we must conclude that Governor Watson had no right to participate in the proceedings of the joint assembly on the 9th day of May, and that being so, it is the duty of this body to say that Mr. Du Pont, having received 15 votes in said joint assembly, which number being a majority of the votes cast by that body as legally constituted, is therefore entitled to a seat in this Chamber. The record discloses the fact that Governor Watson deliberately entered the joint assembly on the day heretofore mentioned for the purpose of preventing an expression of the will of a majority of the duly accredited representatives of the State of Delaware in choosing a member of this Senate. It would be establishing a dangerous precedent to countenance such conduct on the part of those who are called upon to exercise the functions of office of the chief executive of a State. His conduct on that occasion can not be justified either from a moral or political standpoint. It was the act of one who sought by improper device to thwart the will of the majority as clearly expressed at the ballot box, and affords a good illustration of the evils which our forefathers had in view when they framed the constitutions of our various States in such a manner as to forever keep separate and distinct the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of our Government.

Under a representative form of government like ours, when each branch acts solely within its own sphere there can no harm be done to any citizen within our borders; but the moment you attempt to blend the functions of two or more of these branches a palpable violation of the rights of the individual is sure to follow. It is getting to be no unusual occurrence to have deadlocks in our State legislatures lasting, in many instances, during the entire session, to the exclusion of the consideration of all matters of public interest, and finally resulting in the election of no one. In some cases, owing to the fact that neither party has a decisive majority, this condition of affairs is unavoidable, but even then in a free government like ours it is a matter which is to be deplored; but in cases like the one under consideration it is the duty of this body to exercise its discretion under the Constitution of the United States, so that the will of the majority of the people of Delaware, as indicated at the ballot box, shall be carried into effect by adjudging that Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in this Chamber.

ART COMMISSION.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1922) creating an art commission of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHILTON. I think that is a matter of too much importance to come up at this hour of the day. There has been quite a good deal of discussion about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Senator from Texas objects.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I should like to say to the Senator from Texas that I have had this bill up before the Senate several times. It has been very thoroughly considered by the Senate and by individual members of the Senate. I am obliged to leave the city next week, to be away for some time, and I am very anxious to have the bill passed.

I do not believe it will lead to any discussion whatever, and I hope the Senator from Texas will withdraw his objection. It would be a great accommodation to me personally. I know if the Senator understood the difficulties that are met with by members of the Committee on the Library he would not object for one single moment to the passage of the bill. It meets with the unanimous indorsement of every member of that committee, and they are anxious to have it passed.

Mr. CHILTON. I believe I will withdraw the objection, although I do so with reluctance, I confess.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator who has the bill in charge why artists and sculptors are excluded from the commission?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It has been thought best not to have artists and sculptors on the commission because of the fact, as we all know, that artists and sculptors run in schools, and each school, of course, would be prejudiced in favor of such works of art as come from its particular school. The suggestion, therefore, is open to that objection.

Mr. HOAR. Some years ago I drew with great care a bill having the same object in view as the pending bill has, and it passed the Senate after a good deal of discussion. So far from excluding artists, either painters or sculptors, it expressly provided that on the commission, which was to consist of 15 persons, who were to serve gratuitously except having their expenses paid, there should be a certain number of sculptors, a certain number of painters, a certain number of architects, and certain other persons from other callings in life.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will permit me, that the bill does not appertain to architecture at all. It has been deemed best to leave that branch out.

Mr. HOAR. I understand; but that does not affect the point I am going on to make.

I suppose it to be true (I do not speak with any claim of having personal knowledge on the subject, though I had the honor of corresponding with some very eminent persons in art at that time) that the great superiority of France in modern times in its modern monuments, public works of art and architecture both, public statues, memorial statues, and so on, grows out of the fact that they called into the service of the Government in making the selection of those works eminent artists. They always find that artists who, as they say, have won their spurs are impartial and admirable judges, and that they have at heart the best interests of art and of the country; and the criticism which the Senator from North Dakota suggested does not apply.

Now, once or twice within my knowledge there have been called in as advisers in such matters St. Gaudens and Mr. Richard Hunt, who recently died, both eminent artists of the city of New York. Their advice has been of the greatest value. I should be very seriously inclined to move an amendment striking out those words and leaving the appointments to the discretion of the appointing power.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me for just a moment? If the Senator will read section 2 of the bill he will find that it does not pertain in the least to statuary to be located in the various parts of Washington. It is confined exclusively to statuary and works of art which are to be placed in the Capitol building and the new Library building. It does not relate in the least to statues to be located about the city. That is to be done by another process altogether.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the words "other than artists or sculptors." I think there are artists and sculptors in this country whose judgment would be exceedingly valuable in this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 5, after the word "persons," it is proposed to strike out "other than artists or sculptors"; so as to read:

The art commission of the United States, to consist of five persons, who shall be citizens of the United States, etc.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Under the circumstances I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Then, in line 7, I move to strike out "and eminently distinguished in literature and the fine arts." There may be the best man in the country for this purpose who is not eminently distinguished in literature. I think the fact that a person may be regarded by the Senate, or by the House, or by the President as a person of high qualifications is sufficient, and I hope the provision as to distinction in literature will not be adhered to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 7, it is proposed to strike out "and eminently distinguished in literature and the fine arts."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In section 2, line 2, I move to strike out the word "semiannually" and insert "annually"; so that the commission shall convene annually.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, line 2, it is proposed to strike out "semiannually" and insert "annually"; so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of said commission to convene annually in the city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES IN ALABAMA.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up and to have passed a bill that will not give rise to a moment of debate. It is the bill (S. 2461) to grant lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Industrial School for Girls of Alabama and of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator from Tennessee desire to have an executive session this afternoon? I am very anxious to have a bill passed which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] desires shall be disposed of.

Mr. BATE. We have a small number of Senators present now——

Mr. PLATT. It will take perhaps five minutes; only the time necessary to read the bill.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will allow the Senator from Connecticut to call up the bill.

Mr. BATE. That ends it.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, after the words "Indian Territory," to insert "by way of the town of Wyandotte, where said railroad company shall erect and maintain a depot within one-half mile of the business center of said town"; so as to make the section read:

That the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Arkansas, be, and the same is hereby, authorized and invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, and operating, using, and maintaining a railway and telegraph and telephone lines through the Indian Territory upon a line beginning at a point to be selected by said railway company at or near the town of Southwest City, in the county of McDonald, State of Missouri, and running thence in a northwest direction over the most practicable route through the Indian Territory, by way of the town of Wyandotte, where said railway company shall erect and maintain a depot within one-half mile of the business center of said town, to a point between Chetopa and Baxter Springs, in the State of Kansas, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turn-outs, sidings, and extensions through such Territory as said company may deem to their interests to construct along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 20, after the word "taken," to insert:

And before said company shall enter the territory of any tribe of Indians within the Quapaw Agency for the purpose of constructing its line of railroad and telegraph it shall have the written consent of the general council of such tribe thereto, which shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EQUITY COURT ROOMS.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2307) to provide increased accommodations for the second division of the equity court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $2,700 to alter certain rooms in the second and in the third stories of the District of Columbia court-house building, which rooms are now occupied by the second division of the equity court and by the surveyor of the District of Columbia, the money to be expended under the direction of the Architect of the United States Capitol.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. LOUIS, OKLAHOMA AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 67) authorizing the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes. It is a bill that has been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs without amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Pending that, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PEFFER. Let us dispose of this bill. It will take but a moment. There is no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope before the motion is put I may express the hope that the Senator from Washington, unless there is great hurry, will give way. There are one or two bills here that I know there will be no objection to.

Mr. WILSON. I will state, if I may be permitted to do so, that I have waited all the afternoon and also for a number of days past for an executive session relative to certain appointments. It seems to be impossible to have them acted upon. I do not wish, however, to inconvenience any Senator, and I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am much obliged to the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Kansas?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS AT COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 1317) to grant certain lands to the city of Colorado Springs, Colo.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, after the word "Colorado," in line 3, to insert:

Upon the payment of $1.25 per acre by said city to the United States—

So as to read:

be, and the same are hereby, granted and conveyed to the city of Colorado Springs, in the county of El Paso and State of Colorado, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre by said city to the United States, to have and to hold said lands to its use and behoof forever, for purposes of water storage and supply of its waterworks.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That if the city of Colorado Springs shall at any time after the construction of reservoirs on the lands described in section 1 of this act abandon the same or cease to use the same for water storage, the lands herein described shall revert to the Government of the United States. The survey of the lands so granted shall be made under the direction and approval of the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAM REVENUE CUTTER.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1460) for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service in the Gulf of Mexico and tributary waters.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to have constructed a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service in the Gulf of Mexico and tributary waters, the cost of the construction not to exceed $150,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTOR OF C. M. SHAFFER.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill (S. 460) for the relief of the executor of C. M. Shaffer, deceased.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "four"; so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the executor of C. M. Shaffer, deceased, of Berkeley County, W. Va., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,400, in full payment for rent and occupation of his warehouse, in the town of Martinsburg, in said county and State, as a commissary storehouse during the war of the rebellion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 10, after the word "rebellion," at the end of the bill, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That he is satisfied, after examining the claim, that said warehouse was actually occupied by the United States for the purpose alleged; and the claim shall be allowed, at the rate of $50 a month, for such time as it was so occupied and not paid for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSISTANT ENGINEERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 105) for the relief of ex-Naval Cadets John P. J. Ryan, John R. Morris, and Chester Wells.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the President of the United States to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint John P. J. Ryan, John R. Morris, and Chester Wells to be assistant engineers in the Navy. But they shall pass an examination in steam engineering which shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Navy, and take rank and receive pay only from the date of their appointments, and shall rank with each other in the order of merit as shown by the examination provided for.

Mr. PLATT. Was the joint resolution reported by a committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HILL. And it is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PLATT. All right.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to make a request. Will the Senator from Virginia yield one moment?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is to address the Senate to-morrow on an important subject. I rise to ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of his speech we shall go to the Calendar for the consideration of pension bills favorably reported by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HILL. I understood the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] wanted to go on with the Cuban resolutions to-morrow, did he not? He is not here. That is the only difficulty.

Mr. HOAR. I am quite sure the Senator from Ohio understands that the Senator from Missouri is to speak to-morrow, because——

Mr. HILL. That is all right; but the question is as to the order of procedure after the speech of the Senator from Missouri has been concluded.

Mr. PLATT. And I wish to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Tennessee has been for two or three days trying to get an executive session on some matters that ought to be disposed of.

Mr. BATE. I shall desire an executive session to-morrow some time, before it gets too late.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course an executive session would be in order, or any other important business. I will not urge my request, but I should like consent. Of course the matter would be left in the control of the Senate.

Mr. BATE. It is with a degree of delicacy, however, that I would call for an executive session when some one was just going to speak—with a fine audience, and all that. One dislikes to do it. I would not do it to-day for that reason. Of course I could call for an executive session at any time, but I do not want to commit myself.

Mr. GRAY. In reference to the matter of disposing of the Cuban resolutions, I understood it to be the wish of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it is the wish of members of that committee, so far as I have spoken to them, that to-morrow the resolutions might be taken up at some early and convenient hour, and if possible disposed of.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is going to make a speech to-morrow.

Mr. GRAY. I understand.

Mr. PLATT. And it will not be a short speech. It will take quite a while.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There is an understanding as to that, but after the Senator from Missouri gets through for the rest of the morning hour or later——

Mr. PLATT. I do not believe the Cuban resolutions can be disposed of to-morrow, if an opportunity is given to those who desire to make some remarks.

Mr. GRAY. The sooner we get at them the sooner they will be disposed of, whether on to-morrow or some other day. I hope the Senate will consent to devote whatever time it can after the Senator from Missouri has closed his remarks to-morrow to the consideration of the Cuban resolutions.

Mr. BATE. I will not agree to it until after an executive session has been had.

Mr. FRYE. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations told me that immediately on the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Missouri he should bring forward the Cuban resolutions, and that he was so determined to press those resolutions that if any objection were made he should move to proceed to their consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw the request. That settles it.

FRANCES R. JACK AND OTHERS.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 573) for the relief of Frances R. Jack, Elizabeth J. Jack, and Matilda W. Jack.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Frances R. Jack, Elizabeth J. Jack, and Matilda W. Jack $259.22 on account of rent of building in the city of Roanoke, Va., for use as post-office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. NELSON. I ask leave to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6250) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, in the county of Aitkin, State of Minnesota.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committtee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IRON AND COAL MINES ON FOREST RESERVATIONS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1633) to permit owners of claims to iron and coal mines on forest reservations of the United States to perfect their title thereto, and to procure a patent therefor, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 3, before the word "coal," to strike out "and"; in line 4, before the word "mining," to insert "and other"; in line 8, after the word "to," to strike out "pay the price for the lands embraced in said claims now fixed by law to" and insert "perfect title thereto under the mining laws of"; in line 10, after the words "United States," to strike out "and to receive a patent therefor from the United States"; in line 11, after the word "of," to strike out "said" and insert "such"; in line 12, after the word "claims," to strike out "when so paid for, their associates, successors, and assigns"; in line 14, after the word "for," to strike out "a railroad" and insert "railroads or tramways"; in line 15, after the word "construct," to strike out "to be operated by steam or electricity" and insert

"and operate"; and in line 18, after the word "on," to strike out "said" and insert "such"; so as to make the section read:

That all persons who have heretofore located iron, coal, and other mining claims on the lands of the United States, which, subsequently to said location, have been incorporated into forest reservations by proclamation of the President of the United States or otherwise, are hereby granted the right to perfect title thereto under the mining laws of the United States. And the owners of such mining claims are hereby granted a right of way not to exceed 100 feet wide, with necessary depot grounds, for railroads or tramways which they may construct and operate through said reservation to the boundaries thereof, and are hereby granted the right to erect poles on such right of way and necessary electrical appliances for the transmission of electricity to and from said mines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 1 the following proviso:

Provided, That the rights and privileges hereby granted shall not apply to the Yellowstone National Park or the forest reservations attached thereto, nor to any other national park set apart by special act of Congress defining the boundaries thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 5, after the word "same," to insert "under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe to preserve the timber growth and prevent forest fires"; so as to make the section read:

That said parties heretofore mentioned in section 1 are required, before building the railway the right of way for which is herein granted, to file a survey of the route and a map thereof with the Secretary of the Interior, who shall then and there approve the same, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe to preserve the timber growth and prevent forest fires.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know that I caught the meaning of the bill as it was read; but if I did, it obliges the Secretary of the Interior to approve any projected railroad the map of which may be filed in his office. I do not think that ought to be done.

Mr. BERRY. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. PLATT. Let the section to which I refer be read—the second section.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me, I will state what the provision is. However, I shall wait until the Senator examines the bill.

Mr. PLATT. This is the language to which I object:

That said parties heretofore mentioned in section 1 are required, before building the railway the right of way for which is herein granted, to file a survey of the route and a map thereof with the Secretary of the Interior, who shall then and there approve the same.

That language makes it mandatory on the Secretary of the Interior to approve.

Mr. CALL. Let that provision be stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. The provision ought to read "the right shall take effect on the approval," etc.

Mr. PLATT. As the bill now reads it leaves no discretion with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BERRY. That is not the purpose of the bill. If the Senator will suggest a change the committee will adopt it with great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. The same objection occurred to me when the bill was read. It occurs to me that it ought to read: "And the rights herein granted shall accrue when the same shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior," or some phrase of that kind.

Mr. BERRY. The committee had no purpose in the matter except to grant the right of way on forest reservations, where mining claims had been filed before the reservation was made, and the parties had the right, under the law permitting them to run railroads there, to take out the minerals. The object was to require them to secure the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, so that they may not destroy the forest reservations. If the language of the bill does not do that, any amendment to accomplish that purpose will satisfy the committee. It was very carefully considered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], who was formerly Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he thought the purpose was accomplished by the language used in the bill. The entire committee agreed to the bill; there is no objection to it, and the representatives of the Western section of the country were in favor of it.

Mr. PLATT. I move to amend section 2 by striking out all down to and including the word "same," in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 2 down to and including the word "same," in line 5, and to insert:

Before any such railway shall be constructed, a survey and map of the location of the same shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BERRY, the title was amended so as to read:

A bill to permit owners of mining claims on forest reservations of the United States to perfect their title thereto, and to procure a patent therefor, and for other purposes.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF CHAUNCEY M. LOCKWOOD.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 713) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood to commence suit in the Court of Claims of the United States for extra mail service on route No. 16637, extending from Salt Lake City, Utah, to The Dalles, Oreg.; and gives the Court of Claims jurisdiction to adjudicate the same upon the basis of justice and equity, and to render a final judgment for the value of such extra mail service; and from any judgment that may be rendered in the cause either party thereto may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the bar of the statute of limitations shall not avail in such cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD H. MURRELL.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1590) for the relief of Edward H. Murrell.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Edward H. Murrell $1,409.34, that amount having been collected by the Treasury agents of the United States from property in New Orleans, La., belonging to him, and by them turned over to the Treasury Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF COURT REPORTS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2262) to provide for the further distribution of the reports of the Supreme Court and of the circuit courts of appeals.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 20, before the word "reprint," to strike out "an exact" and insert "a"; so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to distribute to each of the following-named officers of the United States, additional to those named in section 683 of the Revised Statutes, namely, each Assistant Secretary of the several Executive Departments of the Government requiring them for official use; each Assistant Attorney-General; the Solicitor of the Department of State; the law clerk and examiner of titles, Department of Justice; the Comptroller of the Currency; the Solicitor of Internal Revenue; the Judge-Advocate-General, Navy Department; the Commissioner of Labor; the Civil Service Commission; the Interstate Commerce Commission; the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States; the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States; the attorney for the District of Columbia, one copy of each volume of the Official Reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, including those already published and those hereafter to be published, or a reprint of the same, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the word "holden," to insert "including the Indian Territory"; so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall likewise distribute to each of the places where circuit and district courts of the United States are now holden, including the Indian Territory, to which they have not already been supplied under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 12, 1889, one complete set of the Official Reports of the Supreme Court, including those already published, and those hereafter to be published, or an exact reprint of the same, or such volumes as with those already furnished will make one complete set, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 3, after the words "United States," to insert "shall be plainly marked on the cover 'The property of the United States'"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That the volumes distributed under the provisions of this act shall remain the property of the United States, shall be plainly marked on the cover "The property of the United States," and shall be transmitted by the justices, judges, clerks, and other officers receiving the same to their successors in office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BAKER. I am requested by the Committee on Pensions to ask for the immediate consideration of House bill No. 2921, in relation to the manner of paying pensions.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2921) to repeal section 6 of an act entitled "An act to define the duties of pension agents, to prescribe the manner of paying pensions, and for other purposes," approved July 8, 1870, and now being section 4784, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the clause that is proposed to be repealed by the bill?

Mr. BAKER. Under the present system there has grown up a custom among the old pensioners of going to the pension agencies, sometimes from 150 to 200 miles distant from their homes, and receiving their money at the pension agency. When they get there they are sometimes imposed upon by sharpers and their money taken from them. Some 18 of the pension agencies have requested that the law be amended so that the checks can be forwarded directly to the pensioners, which will enable them to disburse their money at home, instead of their being put to the inconvenience and hardship in many cases of going to these distant points. This bill is simply intended to do away with that provision of the statute.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is proper to say, in this connection, that a very small portion of the pensioners are paid in this way. I think only some 20,000. Perhaps I have made the number too small.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it is not a large number.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS TO PENSIONERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the bill (S. 2405) empowering fourth-class postmasters to administer oaths to pensioners, which is now upon the Calendar, may be indefinitely postponed, as a bill on that subject has become a law.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY J. HEWITT.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill for the relief of Henry J. Hewitt.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 94) for the relief of Henry J. Hewitt. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the claim of Henry J. Hewitt, of the State of Missouri, for corn, oats, hay, horses, and wagons taken from him for the use of the Army in northern Missouri in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865, and for the use and occupation of his hotel, storehouse, and barns by the military authorities of the United States, at Macon City, Macon County, Mo., and at Lancaster, Schuyler County, Mo., during the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865, such investigation to extend to the status of the claimant, whether loyal or not, the value of the forage and other property taken, the actual rental value of the hotel, storehouse, and barns for the time they were occupied and used by the United States authorities, the purposes for which the hotel, storehouse, and barns were used, and by whose authority and direction, and whether the forage, horses, and wagons so taken were a part of the outfit employed by him as a contractor or subcontractor in carrying the United States mails to northern Missouri and southern Iowa during the years named; and when such investigation shall be completed the Secretary of War shall report the result thereof, with his recommendation thereon, to Congress for its action in the premises.

Mr. PLATT. My attention was diverted for a moment during the reading of the bill. May I inquire of the Senator from Missouri what the provision is for determining whether or not there is anything due to this man?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Secretary of War is to cause an investigation by the Quartermaster's Department and report the result to Congress.

Mr. PLATT. That is satisfactory.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS POLLOCK.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 2176.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2176) granting a pension to Thomas Pollock.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "rate of," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Pollock, late artisan, ordnance department, Benicia Arsenal, Cal., at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. PLATT. Was that person an enlisted man?

Mr. SHOUP. The report will show the fact to be that he was an enlisted man.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the report read.

The Secretary read from the report submitted by Mr. SHOUP February 25, 1896, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2176) granting a pension to Thomas Pollock, have examined the same and report:

It appears from the records of the War Department that the claimant enlisted on the 11th day of March, 1852, at Watervliet Arsenal, and was assigned to the ordnance department, Watervliet Arsenal, United States Army, and was discharged for disability incurred in the line of duty—incurable varicocele—at Bernicia Arsenal, Cal., April 8, 1853.

Mr. PLATT. That is sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 13, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 12, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

GRAND ARMY POST, SEDAN, KANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3265) donating one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to Stone River Post, No. 74, Grand Army of the Republic, Sedan, Kans.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate is simply to change the title by adding the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. At the request of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Chair desires to submit a change of reference to the House.

The letter from the Secretary of War relating to the purchase of land adjacent to the military reservation at Key West, Fla., should go to the Committee on Appropriations instead of the Committee on Military Affairs. In the absence of objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LIGHT-HOUSE AND FOG SIGNAL, BIG OYSTER BED SHOAL, NEW JERSEY.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 55) for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal station at or near Big Oyster Bed Shoal, New Jersey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a light-house and fog-signal station be established at or near Big Oyster Bed Shoal, mouth of the Maurice River, Delaware Bay, New Jersey: Provided, That the same shall not cost more than $25,000.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. There is an amendment, Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit to this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is unanimous consent asked?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proposes to submit an amendment, coupled with the proposition for unanimous consent.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move to amend the bill in line 6 by striking out "twenty-five thousand" and inserting "four thousand five hundred," which is the amount of the estimate of the Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey to consider the bill at this time with the amendment proposed?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE FEDERAL CENSUS.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 47, relating to the Federal census.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas representatives of various Governments which make decennial enumerations of the people are making efforts to secure uniformity in the inquiries to be used in future censuses; and

Whereas also it is expedient to give early consideration to some comprehensive plan for the establishment of a permanent census service: Therefore,

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioner of Labor, now in charge of the Eleventh Census, is hereby authorized and directed to correspond and confer with the census officers of other Governments for the purpose of securing uniformity in the inquiries relating to the people to be used in future censuses; and that said Commissioner is also hereby directed to report to Congress for its consideration, as soon as practicable, a plan for a permanent census service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CRISP. Has this been reported by any committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, by the Committee on Labor.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before action is taken upon that, Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, it proposes simply, first, a correspondence with other countries with reference to uniform data or methods of taking the census, so far as population and occupation are concerned; and then proposes that the Commissioner of Labor shall submit to Congress a plan for a permanent bureau. As I understand it, there is nothing committing Congress to the plan proposed, but only to obtain data on which to submit a plan for action.

Mr. GARDNER. That is all it contemplates.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no objection to that.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

On motion of Mr. GARDNER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HALVOR K. OMLIE.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 818) for the relief of Halvor K. Omlie, of Homen, N. Dak.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Halvor K. Omlie, who, on May 12, 1893, made final proof on his preemption claim for the northwest quarter of section 8, township 163 north, of range 58 west, of the fifth principal meridian, in the State of North Dakota, be, and he is hereby, granted a period of one year from the passage of this act within which to make the necessary payment for said lands.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. What is the report upon this bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me ask if this has been reported by a committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes; unanimously reported by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LACEY. In response to the gentleman from Georgia, I may say that this is the second request of the kind made in behalf of this man, whose sickness has prevented him from completing his preemption entry. It is an extreme case, in which relief was granted in the last Congress, but he requires some further time to enable him to pay for the land on which his home is situated. It is a very clear case and a very meritorious one.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 5382) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis Railroad Company to extend its line of railroad into the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 666) to amend section 4829 of the United States Revised Statutes, concerning surgeons, assistant surgeons, and other medical officers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. Res. 133) directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for necessary repairs at Cleveland Harbor.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound into one convenient volume, at the Government Printing Office, all the various acts of Congress relating to street-railway franchises in the District of Columbia; and that 200 copies of the same shall be furnished for the use of the Senate, 400 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,500 copies for the use of and distribution by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate "providing for the printing of 15,000 copies of the bulletin on apiculture."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the title of joint resolution (S. R. 72) "directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4781) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River," approved February 18, 1893.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River," approved February 18, 1893, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to extend the time for the commencement of the bridge in said act named to one year and the time for its completion to three years from and after February 18, 1893.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—COLEMAN VS. BUCK, SECOND DISTRICT, LOUISIANA.

Mr. MILLER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a report of the Committee on Elections No. 2 in the contested-election case of Coleman vs. Buck, from the Second district of the State of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MILLER] submits a report in a contested-election case. Does the gentleman desire immediate action?

Mr. MILLER of West Virginia. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I imagine it will not be necessary to read the entire report.

Mr. MILLER of West Virginia. The report is unanimous.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The report is unanimous. I imagine it will not be necessary to read the entire report.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That H. Dudley Coleman was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Second Congressional district of the State of Louisiana, and is not entitled to a seat in the House.

Resolved, That Charles F. Buck was elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Second district of the State of Louisiana, and is entitled to his seat in the House.

Mr. MILLER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LOAN OF ORDNANCE TO HIGH SCHOOLS.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I have a joint resolution which will, I think, only take a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] is entitled to the floor, if he insists upon it.

Mr. MERCER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DANIELS. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] desires unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is authorized to issue, at his discretion and under proper regulations to be prescribed by him, out of ordnance and ordnance stores belonging to the Government, and which can be spared for that purpose, such as may appear to be required for military instruction and practice by the students of high schools in the United States where an officer is detailed by the Secretary of War for the purpose of giving military instruction, and the Secretary of War shall require a bond in each case in double the value of the property for the care and safe-keeping thereof and for the return of the same when required.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DOCKERY. I should be glad to have the report read, and before the report is read I will ask the gentleman from Nebraska whether this is a new departure?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report accompanying the bill read.

Mr. MERCER. I will ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. CURTIS of New York) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan ordnance and ordnance stores for military instruction in high schools, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that the resolution do pass:

This resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to issue, at his discretion and under proper regulations to be prescribed by him, out of ordnance and ordnance stores that can be spared, such as may appear to be required for military instruction and practice in high schools where an officer is detailed by the Secretary of War for the purpose of military instruction, the Secretary to require a bond in double the value for care, safe-keeping, and return of the property when required.

This provision seems necessary for proper instruction in such schools by the officer so detailed and appears to be carefully guarded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will explain the matter to the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to reserve the point of order. This seems to be starting out in a policy that will make a great deal of difficulty and expense. There are tens of thousands of high schools in this country.

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman will recollect that this is confined to high schools where an officer of the Army is detailed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I know, but there will be applications——

Mr. MARSH. And there are not 10,000 of them by a good deal.

Mr. DINGLEY. I know that.

Mr. MARSH. They are limited to 100 public schools and colleges. So the 10,000 do not cut much figure.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that all well enough, but applications will come from all of the schools, and we neither have ordnance nor supplies nor teachers for more than a very few schools. It seems to me when we start out in this policy of doing this for the public schools of the country we shall land in a great deal of expense before we get through.

Mr. MERCER. I will say in reply to the gentleman——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I simply object until I can see further about this.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE, ALDRICH VS. ROBBINS—FOURTH DISTRICT, ALABAMA.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the contested-election case of William F. Aldrich against Gaston A. Robbins. It has been agreed by the members of the committee that the time for discussion shall be controlled by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] on the part of the minority and myself on the part of the majority.

It is also agreed by the members of the committee that three hours and a half on each side shall be devoted to the discussion of the points presented in this contested-election case, and, as I have already observed, the time is to be apportioned by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] on the part of the contestee and by myself on the part of the contestant.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman from Arkansas has been called out and is not here, and I did not hear the statement of the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York says that the understanding is that each side is to occupy three and a half hours, the time to be disposed of by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE].

Mr. DANIELS. I will say to the gentleman that I saw Mr. DINSMORE this morning, and that it is satisfactory to him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Gaston A. Robbins was not elected as a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fourth district of Alabama, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That William F. Aldrich was elected a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fourth district of Alabama, and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I desire to introduce a bill to authorize the appointment of a register of copyrights, and to define his duties, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The bill would be referred under the rules.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as under the rules it would go to another committee.

The SPEAKER. That would not give the committee any jurisdiction.

Mr. DOCKERY. I withdraw the request.

Mr. DANIELS. I yield an hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], my colleague on the committee.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DANIELS. I suggest that the gentleman come over here, nearer to the center of the Hall, so that we may be better able to hear him.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, let me reply to the suggestion of the chairman of the committee that there is some remonstrance in this part of the Hall to my moving to the place he suggests. I will say to him that in case he fails to hear me, if he will make a further suggestion for removal, I shall feel obliged to yield to him, in deference to the right of the greater portion of this assembly.

It is my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to devote that portion of the time which is allotted to me to a plain statement of the outline of this case, leaving to my colleagues upon the committee the more important duty of arguing it in detail. This contest arises in the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama. In that district, in the election of 1894, Mr. Gaston A. Robbins received the nomination and support of the Democratic party, and Mr. William F. Aldrich received the nomination of the Republican party and the indorsement and support of the Populite party and that wing of the Democratic party in Alabama that is called by the name of Jeffersonian Democrats. On the face of the returns Mr. Robbins received a majority of 3,736. That majority was attacked before the committee on the ground that it was fraudulent; and the committee have presented the contest to this House in three reports, two reports from the Republican members of the committee and one report from the Democratic members of the committee.

The Democratic members of the committee agree that the returned plurality of 3,736 votes should be reduced, on the ground of fraud in the conduct of the election, to 559. The Republican members of the committee go further, and report—one wing of them—that not only the majority awarded to Mr. Robbins should be reduced, but that it should be extinguished altogether, and that the true majority was 601 for Mr. Aldrich, the Republican. Another wing of the Republican majority thinks that the plurality of Mr. Aldrich should be increased, and that the true plurality is 1,131 votes. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that there is no contest between the Republican members of this committee on the result. Every Republican on the committee agrees that there was sufficient fraud in the election to vitiate the returns and to seat the Republican contestant.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it becomes an important thing for us to consider the nature of the district in which this contest arises. The Fourth Alabama district is composed of six counties. Five of them are known as white counties—that is, counties where the white population and the white voters largely predominate—and one of them is known as a black county, a county in which the colored voters and the colored population largely predominate. In the counties in which the white voters predominate, on the face of the returns the Republican candidate, Mr. Aldrich, received a majority of 1,654 votes. He therefore reached the black county with that majority in his favor, but by the returned vote in the county of Dallas, which is the black county, not only that plurality was met and extinguished, but a plurality was counted for the sitting member. The county of Dallas showed upon the face of the returns 5,462 votes to the Democrat and 72 votes to the Republican.

Now, it is important to consider what sort of a county it was in which there should be a majority of 5,390 votes against the candidate representing the Republican party, the Populist party, and the Jeffersonian Democratic party. In the first place, it is a county in which the population—I eliminate now odd numbers—was 49,000. There are 8,000 white population in the county and 41,000 colored population. It may be said, Mr. Speaker, once for all, that members of this House may have it as a fact to carry with them all through the case, that in the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama, in the county of Dallas, at least, of the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama, the colored voters are Republican almost to a man; not only that, but that in that county the colored voters outnumber the white 5 to 1. But we have an estimate of the voters in that county upon which you may safely rely. At an outside estimate there are 7,500 colored voters and 2,500 white voters.

Those 7,500 voters were all, or substantially all, Republicans. The 2,500 voters were not all, or substantially all, Democratic voters in the year 1894. There were Populists and there was a faction of the Democratic party known as the Jeffersonian Democrats, whose differences with the Organized Democratic party of Alabama were that the one believed in an honest ballot and the other believed in the fraudulent methods that have prevailed there now for almost a generation. Now, let us see in outline—for I speak only in outline—what brought about this marvelous result in the black Republican county of Dallas. Since 1880—and I need only appeal to the memory of members who have served in this House for years and who have witnessed the contests that time and time again have come up from the black belt of Alabama—since 1880 there has not been an honest election in the county of Dallas; there has not been a time when the Republican voters did not go to the polls and either have their votes thrown out and disregarded by fraudulent technicalities or have them counted Democratic. In the year 1894 they despaired of having Republican voters go to the ballot box and put in their votes and have them counted otherwise than as Democratic.

How much they despaired, Mr. Speaker, this House can best know and appreciate when I tell them that the Republican party in that county disfranchised themselves, choosing rather to lose their votes than to have them counted for the Democratic candidate. The Republican party authority in Alabama issued an order or a request to the Republican voters in the county of Dallas not to register in the spring and not to vote in the fall. The evidence in this record proves, and proves conclusively, that to a very great extent the Republicans of Dallas County complied with that request made by their leaders. I may say here, because it is a point of importance, that that request or direction did not apply to the Populists and did not apply to the Jeffersonian Democrats. But even the Republicans of Alabama did not know the depth of infamy to which their opponents would descend in order to destroy honest elections in that county, for it soon became obvious that even the deliberate self-disfranchisement of the Republican voters would not keep the Democratic managers from counting their votes for the Democratic candidate.

The chief of the conspiracy that was entered into to defraud the voters of Dallas County of their rights was the judge of probate of that county. Under the laws of Alabama no man (with some trifling exceptions) can vote in the fall election unless he has registered in the spring preceding the election. On the first Monday of May it is the duty of the registrars in the various counties and precincts to open the registration. It is continued for thirty days. At the end of thirty days the registration list upon which the vote is to be taken in the fall election is made up and is placed in the hands of the probate judge. He holds the registration list of the county. It is a public document. Every citizen has the right, under a rule of law that will not be challenged, to inspect that document and to have a copy of it.

Members will see how important that right was in this case. The Republicans had not registered, acting under the direction of their State central committee. It was important for them to know, therefore, whether there was a fraudulent registration list made up in time for the election. It was important for them to know, after the election was held, whether there was an honest registration and a fraudulent poll list. That registration list—I may as well trace it now to the end, because its history will be of consequence by and by—that registration list was placed in the hands of the judge of probate. It is his duty to give a copy of it to the inspectors at each precinct, and after the election is over it is their duty to return it to him by a circuitous route, and he keeps it, under a statutory provision that it "shall be open to the inspection of any elector in the county." That registry list of the spring of 1894 has never been seen by mortal eye to this day. I am told—this is outside the record, I know—I am told that even the grand jury of Dallas County have not been able to get the record of registration that was made in the spring.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman point out in the record where it is stated that the grand jury have been unable to get a copy? I have not seen the statement.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, I will say that I have already stated to the House that that fact is not set forth in the record.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not hear him.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Aldrich, the contestant, knowing the importance of having the registration list as a foundation for subsequent proceedings, wrote to the judge of probate on the 25th day of September, which was before the election, saying to him, "I desire to obtain from your office a certified copy of the registry of voters of Dallas County by beats"—the word "beat" being used as an equivalent for "precinct." He received no reply. Upon October 3, still before the election, the chairman of the Republican county committee wrote to the judge of probate and asked for the registry list or a copy thereof. He received no reply. Again, on October 11, he wrote for the same purpose and received no reply. After the election was over, when the evidence was being taken by the commissioner, he required of this judge of probate certified copies of the registration lists in certain important beats, and he received a reply from the counsel of the sitting member that it would be produced "as soon as it is possible for the same to be done." But it never has been produced, and no mortal man has yet seen that registry list which contained the list of men who alone were entitled to vote in that county at the election. Whether it is destroyed, whether it is honest or dishonest, no man except the judge of probate knows.

But that is not all. The law of Alabama provides that there shall be three inspectors at each election and that each party shall have at least one of those inspectors. The inspectors are appointed by three persons, one of whom is this judge of probate to whom I have already referred several times. Two clerks are elected, and they are elected by the inspectors. The only right of representation which a candidate has at the ballot box under the law of Alabama is his statutory right to be represented in the person of one of the inspectors. Knowing that the Democrats were withholding the registration list, which was the foundation of the right to vote, Mr. Aldrich, with the chairman of the Republican committee and the chairman of the Populist committee, applied to the judge of probate for what was his right under the law—the right to be represented at the polls by an inspector. He presented to the judge of probate a list of several names for each precinct. It was proved that those were the names of men of reputable and upright character, men of intelligence—all of them white men. In those precincts where the vote was meant to be fraudulent, not a single one of those whose appointment had been requested of him by the Republican candidate and the chairman of his committee was appointed.

In that part of the county where the vote was fraudulent, the judge of probate and his associates did not even appoint a single Republican, with three exceptions; and those exceptions show better than the rule the purpose of the man who was making the appointments. He appointed in one beat a man by the name of Bowie, an ignorant negro, who could not read or write. And who were the other two inspectors? One was the man who had been his master in the days of slavery, and the other was the man for whom he then worked and upon whose place he then lived. Thus the Republican representative was an illiterate, ignorant inspector under the power of his old master and his present employer.

In the city of Selma there was appointed as inspector a miserable, rascally, purchasable negro, apparently as big a villain as there is out of jail in Alabama; he was appointed to represent the Republican party at that precinct. In a third precinct a man crept in by accident as one of the inspectors, it not being known what his political belief was. Thus we have the entire election machinery of a part of Dallas County in the hands of the Democratic managers, without any control, without any check upon them by the registration list, without any check upon them by representation at the polls.

Now, what did the Republicans, who had disfranchised themselves for the sake of an honest victory—who knew that they could win even without the votes in the black county, if the ballots were counted honestly—what did they do? They appointed at each precinct one or two persons who should during the day watch the poll and report how many men could possibly have voted. In the county of Dallas there were 28 beats, and what I am about to state shows better than anything else in the case to what extent the fraud which had been made possible by the judge of probate existed in reality. In 13 of the 28 beats there was fraud; in the remainder there was an honest election. Where there was an honest election the Republican inspectors were at the polls. Where there was a dishonest election there was no Republican inspector at the polls. Where there was an honest election and a Republican inspector—through that part of the county which contains 40 per cent of its population—there were polled, according to the returns, 293 votes. In the rest of the county, where there was no Republican inspector at the polls and which contained 60 per cent of the population of the county, there were polled 5,241 votes, according to the returns.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to go over, in outline, these precincts—13 in number—which have been found to be fraudulent. Let me, however, first recite—and when I have done this I might as well stop and leave the decision of this case with the House—let me first recite the facts upon which every member of this committee, whether Republican or Democrat, agrees. Here are 10 precincts, in the fraudulent part of Dallas County, where the Republican party had neither registration lists nor a representation at the polls. In the precinct of Summerfield, upon the returns, the vote stood 160 for Robbins and 2 for Aldrich. Every member of the committee, Republican and Democratic alike, says that of those 162 votes, 131, or more than 81 per cent, were fraudulent. In the precinct of Martins there were returned 503 for Robbins, none for Aldrich. Every member of the committee agrees that 443 of those 503 votes, more than 87 per cent, were fraudulent. In Lexington precinct the return was 250 for Robbins and 1 for Aldrich. Every member of the committee agrees that 214, or 85 per cent, of those votes were fraudulent. In River beat the return was 276 for Robbins, none for Aldrich; and every member of the committee agrees that 267 of those votes, more than 96 per cent, were fraudulent. In Union beat the return was 293 votes for Robbins, none for Aldrich; and the nine members of the committee, Democrats and Republicans alike, agree that 287 of those votes, more than 98 per cent, more than 9 out of every 10, were fraudulently put into the ballot box by the Democratic inspectors, whose conduct was not checked by the representation at the polls which Mr. Aldrich had the right to have under the law of Alabama.

At Elm Bluff beat there were returned 123 votes for Robbins and 12 for Aldrich; and of this vote every member of the committee agrees that 128, or 95 per cent, were fraudulent. At Carlowville beat the return was 127 votes for Robbins, none for Aldrich; and every member of the committee agrees that at least 74 per cent of those votes are fraudulent. At Boykins beat all the members of the committee agree 50 per cent of the votes returned were fraudulent. At Mitchells the return was 389 votes, all for Robbins; and we all agree that 373 of those votes (95 per cent) were fraudulent. In the city of Selma the return was 2,014 for Robbins, 5 for Aldrich; and every member of the committee agrees that 1,247 of those votes, or more than 60 per cent, were fraudulent.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what we all agree to. The Democratic members of the committee, however, stop there. They can not go any further without going over the brink and seating the Republican candidate.

But the Republicans go to certain other precincts—Woodlawn precinct, Orville and Oldtown precincts—and find precisely the same frauds we found committed in the other precincts, and so they must seat the Republican contestant by the majority I have already named.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose, without going over these beats in detail, to take up three, and only three, of them for the purpose of illustrating the evidence upon which the committee acted and the method which they adopted in treating that evidence. Take, for instance, Woodlawn precinct No. 2. That is a precinct on which the Republican members of the committee and our friends on the other side differ. They say the returns ought to stand as they appear in the report of the election officers. We think otherwise, and I take it—because it may be fairly presumed to be among the weakest cases in favor of the Republican contestant—I take it as an illustration of the rest. At Woodlawn precinct the testimony shows the number of votes cast to have been 14. The poll list, however, shows 130 votes for Robbins and 9 for Aldrich.

The testimony shows that there were 45 white men all told, of all shades of politics, in this precinct, and that every negro in it was a Republican. There were two men who were employed, or employed themselves rather, to go to the polls at this precinct and see how many men went there and how many voted. There was some attack upon them; but I can not say that it was successful. One was a school-teacher who had been in the Confederate service, had been in a "Yankee" prison, as he termed it, and never in any other, and the other was a farmer. They were Populists and went to watch the vote. They picked out from the poll list the 14 men who went to the precinct on that day and gave the names of them. They say that not another man could possibly have voted, for no other person alive and in bodily form went to the polls from the opening to the close; and, as I said, they give the name of every man who went there on that occasion. Further than that one of the witnesses, R. B. Cater, was one of the men who voted last, and his number was 14 on the poll list, thus confirming, by the act of the Democratic inspectors themselves, his own testimony. But the only thing to go on against these men is the testimony of a man, one St. John Lewis Tavel, who was one of the precinct officers at the election; a Democrat, he says. I desire to call the attention of the House to the testimony, or part of the testimony, that he gave.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. What did you say was the vote at this precinct?

Mr. MOODY. The vote returned was 130 for Robbins, 9 for Aldrich. The testimony to which I have just been referring shows that only 14 voted, and no one knows how they voted.

This man Tavel, to whom I have been referring, was a Democratic inspector, and the Democratic minority of the committee rely largely on his testimony to meet the positive statements of the two men whose testimony I have outlined. Let us see now what kind of a man he was and how far his testimony is of any value. In the first place, he was for two or three years before this election a Populite and had been in the councils of the Populist party, and told them that the Democratic inspectors in this very beat would count a majority against them whether they voted or whether they did not vote. He was again converted, however, to Democracy, and became an inspector of elections at this election. How did he answer the first question submitted to him, which was:

Did more than 14 men vote at this election?

He says:

I refuse to answer that question. I recognize that I am under oath now.

The counsel next asked him, after taking up the poll list: "Can you pick out of the list any other names than the 14 who have been named as voting"?

Now, there was a test. They were men who knew he lived in that beat, and he had lived there all his life, and he was an inspector of the elections. If he swore falsely and named specific names there was a strong chance of indictment for perjury. He responds:

I can not.
Q. Will you try?
A. No.

And it is on this testimony that the Democratic members of this committee would overturn the finding of the Republican majority. I leave it with you gentlemen here to determine, without another word. [Applause.]

I take up next the River beat, because it is one of the worst. I want to give you samples of all these beats. In this beat the vote was 276 to nothing—in favor of the Democrat, of course. There were 15 or 20 white people at the outside in that beat.

Almost every man there was a negro, and every negro or almost every negro was a Republican. The evidence is clear. The poll list is taken up, and 19 names are selected in the first place who specifically swear that they did not vote; or some of them swore to that. Not all of them could swear; because of that 19, 5 were fictitious men who had no existence in the world, 7 were dead; 1 of them had been dead twelve years, and 1 of them was lynched about a year ago, almost within sight of the precinct where these Democrats voted him the year after. [Laughter.]

Now, it was in this precinct that they felt safe to trust the Republican negro inspector, because on the one side of him was his young master in the days of slavery, and upon the other side was his master in the days of his freedom. They felt safe to trust him therefore, but the old man was honest. He was illiterate. He could not meet the fraudulent conduct of his associates, but he was honest when the time came to take his oath and give his testimony.

He tells us in respect to this beat, where 276 votes were returned, that there was only 1 colored voter, and he was the man; that only 7 or 8 men came in that day, and there were only 7 or 8 ballots in the box at the close of the voting, but that during the day one of the inspectors, his present master, read over to the other inspector, his old master, between 200 and 300 names for some purpose, he did not know what, and that they were copied down on a piece of paper.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not one particle of contradiction to that testimony. There is not a particle of contradiction to any testimony in this case, because, conscious of the fraud of which he was reaping the benefit, the sitting member did not see fit to inform this House through its committee of any facts bearing upon the validity of his election.

Let me take one more precinct, and I am done with the precincts. I have a few words more to say upon another subject. Let me come to the City precinct. I take that because it is the most important in the amount. As you will remember, there were 2,014 votes returned for Robbins and 5 for Aldrich.

Let us see what sort of a city Selma was. By the census of 1890 it contained 7,622 population. The testimony of the president of the State senate of Alabama, a Democrat, whose testimony is found in the record, shows that 55 per cent of the population of Selma are colored.

Yet out of a little over 3,500 white population they were able to get 2,019 votes, and they must have voted, and it appears they did vote, the cradle and the grave in order to arrive at that result.

In 1893 the total registration in Selma was 623. The registration for this year was fraudulently withheld by the false probate judge, who disgraces any seat of justice, wherever he may occupy it.

We take the poll list, as it is called. Let me explain to you what the poll list is. The law of Alabama provides specifically that when a voter comes to the polls his name shall be called out, the name written down on what is called a poll list, and a number attached to it, so that an honest poll list would conform to the actual order of the voters who appear to vote.

Now, the first thing that we have to say about that poll list is that it is an afterthought. A man voted at 4 o'clock, according to the testimony; his number is 1502. Another one voted at 1.30; his number is 1445. Another voted at 4.40, just before the polls closed; his number is 221. Nobody voted afterwards. Another man voted ten minutes before him, or between 4 and 4.30, and his number is 1674. Another voted at 3, and his number on the list is 151.

These were, with one exception, Democrats, who did not know the meaning and purpose of the testimony they were giving. The moment they began to find out the purpose of it, there was not a Democrat in Selma who could tell whether he voted at 8 o'clock in the morning or 5 o'clock in the evening. [Laughter.] But they had told enough to show that the poll list which appears in this record was fraudulently made up as an afterthought; and that is the first step we take here, in addition to all the probabilities in the case.

But now we go further. There was one ballot box, an Australian ballot box. The polls opened at 8 o'clock and closed at 5. In order to have voted the 2,021 votes, they would have had to put 4 votes a minute into that ballot box, which everybody within the hearing of my voice knows to be an impossibility.

But we go further. We have the testimony of the watchers there. We have two men, one the clerk in the probate office, and another apparently responsible man, for all that I could see. They stood there by the court-house, and they watched its entrances all day long, from sunrise to sunset. One of them said there were 715 men who entered the court-house, and the other said there were 723.

They could not see the polling place; they could only see the inclosure of the court-house. They knew these men went in, but when they got inside of the court-house there was the office of the probate court and register corresponding to it; there was the tax collector's office, the sheriff's office. There was the city court of Selma, where people naturally would be going in from time to time; and although seven hundred and odd men went into that inclosure that day, no man can tell whether they voted, whether they went for the purpose of voting, or whether they did something else, and went in for the purpose of doing something else. Now, then, let us go still further than that. I take up this poll list [exhibiting]. There are the names. We can not get from the judge of probate the register list upon which this vote was founded. No man can get it. No man can get it, because if it is honest it would reveal the whole truth. This was put in the hands of a former member of Congress for this district, a man who knows almost every man, woman, and child in the city of Selma. He takes it up, and he can recognize out of these 2,000 names not over 696 as being genuine living persons. The contestant calls the register of vital statistics, a man who has held that office for a number of years, and the health officer of the county, a man who would know the population and know the names. He testifies: "I have examined that list carefully." Evidently he had examined it before, and what does he say? He says—I do not quote exactly: "The first 221 names on the list are names of genuine persons. The next 1,012 in a body are the names of persons who either never had any existence or have long ago passed out into the graveyards of Selma. The next 481 names appear to be names of genuine persons; the next 279 are fictitious, and the last 5 are genuine." Out of this poll list 1,309 names are proved by evidence which is not contradicted in the slightest degree to be the names of dead or fictitious or absent persons.

Now, then, let us see at what point we have arrived. We know that about 700 people went into the court-house inclosure. We know there were about 700 people who had an honest right to vote that day. We do not know whether the 700 who went into the court-house inclosure were the 700 who had an honest right to vote. We do not know that they did vote, or if they did for whom they voted. We have not anything except the lying statement of these inspectors which shows that any man who had an honest right to vote had actually availed himself of it. I may pause a moment there to state that here is the point of difference between the two wings of the Republicans upon the committee. The chairman of the committee, for whom we all justly feel the greatest deference, feels that honesty and justice require that every one of these 700 honest names upon the list should be deemed to have voted and his vote counted for the Democratic candidate.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. And there is no proof that they did vote.

Mr. MOODY. There is no proof that any single man cast a vote. Of course, the probability is that they did; but there is no proof of it. The other members of the committee feel that we ought not to do this. The returns are so tainted with fraud that they have lost all credit. In that every member of the committee, Republican and Democrat, agrees. We feel it is our duty to entirely disregard the return. We agree with the decision of the supreme court of Illinois that it is proof merely that there was an election at that poll, and proof of no other fact whatever, and we count for either candidate only such votes as are proved to have been cast for him.

Again, we believe it would be a dangerous precedent in deciding controversies of this kind. We find that fraud in election is an old ulcer in this county; it is too old, it is too malignant, to warrant any generous surgery. We have got to cut it out if healthy flesh comes with it. If we do disfranchise now and then an honest elector, it is really for his own benefit and the benefit of his own State and county. [Applause.]

I do not charge Mr. Robbins with participation in these frauds. The evidence shows the contrary. But he has reaped the fruits of others' misconduct. It is only another application of the principle which we find so frequently in the administration of the law, that when one of two innocent persons must suffer he must suffer by whose conduct the wrong was made possible. The intelligent men of the city of Selma and of the county of Dallas are not innocent men before God. This is not a conspiracy such as that which we heard of here the other day in the State of Missouri, a conspiracy of the ward heelers and the plug uglies, who have no countenance from any respectable man of any party; this is a conspiracy of the most intelligent part of the population in the county of Dallas, led by the judge of probate. They have the remedy in their own hands. They can have honest elections there if they see fit, and I thank God that it has come to my ears since the conclusion of this case that 500 Democrats in the city of Selma have formed a club to promote honest elections. [Applause.] I say to this House that it is our duty to help those honest Democrats to secure the object which they seek, and, when the vote comes upon this case, to send down the message to the people of the county of Dallas and to the city of Selma that no man shall come here and sit to represent them in this or any other Congress whose garments are so reeking with fraud that he defiles the very atmosphere which we breathe. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to yield half an hour at this time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], but he is not present, and therefore I suppose it will be necessary for some gentleman on the other side to proceed now.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman whether he expects any gentleman to address the House on that side at this time?

Mr. DANIELS. I can not say. As I have just stated, I had expected that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] would occupy half an hour after the gentleman from Massachusetts, but he is not present and, as he has been absent so long this morning, I think it probable that he is detained from the House by illness or other disability.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there are to be four speakers on that side and only two on this, I think it very desirable, if it can be effected, that we should hear further from the other side at this time. Still, I do not want to be captious about it, and if no one upon that side is prepared to address the House, I suppose we shall have to go on.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to oblige the other side, and if the gentleman from North Carolina were present he would undoubtedly proceed at this time, but I can not account for his absence, and it seems now to be doubtful whether he will be here this morning.

Mr. DINSMORE. Then, Mr. Speaker, we will proceed, and I will yield such time as he desires to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, before I proceed, I desire to have read the resolutions proposed by the minority of the committee, which I shall advocate as a substitute for the resolutions proposed by the majority.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That William F. Aldrich was not elected a member of the House of Representatives from the Fourth district of Alabama for the Fifty-fourth Congress, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That Gaston A. Robbins was duly elected a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fourth district of Alabama, and is entitled to a seat therein.

HUGH A. DINSMORE.
CHARLES L. BARTLETT.
SMITH S. TURNER.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House: Cæsar divided Gaul into three parts. Our Cæsar here divided the Committee on Elections of the House into three parts, and, keeping up this rule of three, it seems that the Elections Committee was compelled to divide itself up into three parts, for we have three reports in this contested-election case. Although there are six members of the majority—although, from the argument of my friend from Massachusetts, Mr. MOODY, this case on the part of the contestee so reeks with fraud that the gentleman can not but feel contaminated by association with the gentleman who now occupies the seat or by breathing the same atmosphere in this House—in spite of these facts, the Republican majority upon the committee could not come to any conclusion about this case except that they wanted Robbins's seat. They remind me of the little rhyme that we all heard in our childhood:

I do not love thee, Doctor Fell,
The reason why I can not tell;
But this alone I know full well,
I do not love thee, Doctor Fell.

So, Mr. Speaker, we come to the consideration of this case to determine who was elected; not whom this House shall elect, but whom the honest voters and electors of the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama cast their ballots for; not whom we shall cast our votes for to-day. We had hoped, those of us who heard the argument in the House when this division of the Elections Committee into three parts was made, that a new light had dawned upon this body. We were induced to hope and believe from the speeches of some of the distinguished gentlemen on the other side, who argued in support of the resolution to abandon the old line of procedure in contested-election cases, that when certain questions were to be decided, questions of law as well as questions of fact, we were not henceforth to be guided solely by that "will-o'-the-wisp" partisanship, which had oftentimes led and must lead into doubt and difficulty and wrong.

We all remember well the language of the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], which I have before me, in which he assured this House, because he said he knew it to be true, and had no hesitation in assuring the House that the sole purpose in trying these cases would be to try them as judges and to determine the issues, not as partisans, but as judicial officers, upon the law and facts as they appear. Even the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], who is the chairman of one of these Elections Committees, assured us that such would be the method, that we might rest assured that these cases, when they came to be considered by the committee and to be determined by the House, would be determined, not by charges of fraud simply, not by charges of wrong, not by allegations, not by political necessity, because no such political necessity existed for the majority here, not by carrying out the doctrine of retaliation, but in that calm, judicial, unprejudiced manner in which judges clothed in the ermine of the law determine questions of law and of facts, and he rejoiced that the opportunity now offered itself when this Congress might and would establish a new precedent which will justly be followed by all future Congresses.

To such calm, judicial consideration and determination of contested-election cases in this House were we invited on December 17 last.

Remembering these matters, I am reminded to-day of a rule that a distinguished chancellor of England, Lord Hale, laid down for his own guidance, and I commend it to this House. He said that—

In determining questions judicially before him, he carefully laid aside his own passions and did not give way to them however much provoked.

He said, further, that—

He suffered not himself to be prepossessed with any judgment at all until the whole business and both parties were heard.

Audi alteram partem was the rule he always adopted.

Yet to-day, when this House is sitting in judicial judgment to render a solemn decision upon the right of a member to occupy his seat upon this floor, when the House is exercising the highest constitutional duty that it can ever be called upon to perform, the learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], my colleague on the committee, attempts to hurry and force it by an appeal to passion and prejudice. I shall not follow him in that line of discussion. If I did so, I might refer to other States and cities—not Southern States, but Northern Republican States, where they roll up Republican majorities mountain high, like Pelion on Ossa—where frauds are committed, and where not simply dead and absent people are voted and counted by the Republican election officers, but where cats and dogs have been voted and the registration, enrollment, and poll lists have been padded with thousands of fraudulent names. I will not indulge in any such line of remark now or call specific attention to them. It is not my purpose to do so, unless disputed.

Mr. Speaker, ever since elections were had there have been irregularities and even frauds; and in all sections the effort in recent years has been to cure the inefficiency of election laws, and to insure honest elections, and in this sentiment I heartily concur. We are told that this is the same old district which, from Congress to Congress, makes its appearance before this House. How does that affect the question whether Mr. Robbins or Mr. Aldrich was elected? How does that determine the question whether, as shown by this record, there were cast a sufficient number of honest votes for Gaston A. Robbins to elect him, or a sufficient number to elect William F. Aldrich?

I stand here, representing, as I believe, the sentiment of the minority of this committee, to make the statement, in which they will bear me out, that so far as we were concerned we met the majority of the committee more than half way in arriving at the truth and in purging all the fraud. We endeavored to do our duty and to find the truth from the facts and the law as established by the authorities and the precedents of this House in purging the polls of every fraudulent ballot that may have been cast, and I think we have done so. The gentlemen of the majority went with us a part of the way, but when the light broke on them, which, if they had followed it, would leave a Democrat in his seat, they dodged like a Texas mule at its own shadow.

I do not propose, and in this I voice again the view of the minority, to sanction or countenance a single fraudulent ballot that may be shown to have been cast, or to count a single ballot that was not cast; but we do insist that when we have cast aside every fraudulent vote, as we have done, the honest electors who did cast their votes shall have them counted for the man of their choice, and that this House shall not seat a man who was not elected.

The gentleman who has just spoken has told you of his anxiety about the people of Dallas County. He has told you that to seat this contestant is to declare to the people of that county and of the Fourth district of Alabama that honest elections are hereafter to be held; and in pursuing this line he does what he did in one or two other parts of his argument—he goes outside of the record. This able lawyer, this gentleman skilled in the argument of cases, familiar with the rules of evidence and with the rules of the House, and having on his side a large majority of this body, goes outside of the record.

Not satisfied with pouring into the ears of the House the tales of wrong and fraud which he says characterized that election, not satisfied with holding up before this House in holy horror these returns, not satisfied with demanding that this House purge itself of the breath of fraud by turning out the sitting member, knowing the judicial manner in which we should proceed in a case of this kind, the judicial gentleman from Massachusetts, in presenting a judicial question, appeals to the tribunal that is to determine the question by bringing here matters unauthorized by the record and not sanctioned, as I apprehend, by any sound practice. He goes out of the record to tell this House that 500 Democrats out of 800 in the city of Selma have met together and determined on fair elections.

Where does he get that information? What business has it here at such a time as this? I do not know how it came to his ears. I suppose that upon the return of the contestant from that very successful journey that he made to the Fourth district of Alabama, to secure Presidential delegates for a certain Republican Presidential aspirant, in which he failed, and after the very successful journey that he took in order to secure a renomination for himself for Congress from the Republicans of this district—which he did not obtain—I presume this contestant has brought here that information. It seems that this contestant has been repudiated by his own party in his own district, and the only solace he has in his defeat at their hands is that he has accomplished something for the Democrats in Selma. Truly, "a prophet is not without honor, save in his own country."

Sir, if the people of Alabama, if the Republicans of Alabama, if the dissatisfied Democrats of Alabama, if the negroes of Alabama, if any party in Alabama are so wrought up and delighted because the sun of pure elections is bursting through the clouds that heretofore have been so dark and lowering, and if we are now to have fair elections because Mr. Aldrich is to be seated here, then, in the name of heaven, what has come over that same gallant constituency of Populists and of negro Republicans and of white Republicans that they kicked him out of their convention and did not renominate him, the champion of honest elections in the Fourth Alabama district?

Ah, sir, I find I have gone out of the record; it might not have been proper for me to do so, but I have done so in reply to a statement made outside of the record. Sir, when the Republican destroying angel passed over this House and determined what Democratic contestee should be sacrificed and what one should be spared, it failed to leave any sign upon the lintels of the doorposts of my friend who sits behind me, the contestee in this case; but from the start he, I fear, has been marked for slaughter.

Sir, fraudulent registration lists, the voting of dead or absent people, and other proceedings of that kind are not confined to or peculiar to the Fourth district of Alabama. We have had such things in Republican States and cities North. I make this statement (and I have the proof of it at hand) not for the purpose of suggesting that it should be considered in connection with this case, nor to excuse or palliate in the least such methods, for I abhor and detest them, but for the purpose of showing how absolutely out of place such suggestions are when we are striving to find the truth in a judicial way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming down to this case, and discussing it somewhat in detail in the time I have and in the line of discussion I have marked out for myself, I desire to say that seven members of the committee agreed that no county outside of Dallas has been successfully attacked in this contest. The chairman of the committee, for whom personally I have the very greatest respect and esteem, whose opinions, coming as they do from a man who has occupied the positions that he has occupied, are obliged to carry not only to that side, but to myself and those on this side who agree with me, great weight, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COOKE], my personal friend (I am glad to say), agrees with him and differs with the other seven members of the committee in this respect, and have thrown out 165 votes in two other counties.

The majority of the committee, seven out of nine, have found that in no precinct except in Dallas are the votes to be changed from the way they are returned. But these four gentlemen of the committee have, in a county where there were 3,000 white Democratic votes cast, only allowed 30 votes out of the contested precincts; yet they have, after searching the record, most diligently looking through it and scanning it in the closest possible manner, determined that there was only one county in the district, the county of Dallas, that could be successfully assailed in behalf of the contestant in this case; therefore I apprehend the House, however it may vote on this question, will determine that the contest should be confined to Dallas County.

Now, it may be asked, what difference is there in the various reports submitted by the committee? Judge DANIELS makes a report in which he gives 1,270 votes out of the total votes cast for the contestant in Dallas County. Judge DANIELS makes a report in which he deducts 165 votes in the counties of Calhoun and Shelby. These 165 deducted from the votes in Shelby and Calhoun counties seven members of the committee say ought not to be deducted.

The proof is that in each precinct of that county was a Republican inspector, some of them prominent Republicans, men of character and standing. At one of these precincts attacked was one Mr. Noble, a member of that family of Northern men who have gone to Anniston with capital from the East and made it a great city; men from the North who carried money there, who put it into manufacturing and mining industries in the county, who carried with them as well their Republicanism—and this man Noble, a gentleman, a man of character, a man of means, and a man of standing in that community, was an inspector at one of the precincts where the minority faction of the majority propose to throw out 85 ballots. There was a Republican at the other precincts, and the election in that precinct is not attacked for fraud, the ballots have not been produced or called, and yet upon the loose statement of voters that they intended to vote or that they had voted for Aldrich, the loose statements of ignorant men who can not read, can not write, who could not even mark their ballots, some of whom swear so fast that they swear "out of sight," forswear themselves; for they swear that 30 or 40 ballots were marked in the shops where they worked, when, as a matter of fact, the law requires that the tickets shall not be given out at all until the voter is at the polling booth, and the ballot is marked in the polling place; and it is upon such evidence that it is proposed to reject ballots and count them for contestant.

Further, Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Republican campaign committee in this district, W. J. Stevens, also a member of the Republican executive committee of that State, of whom doubtless some of you have heard, and from whom was printed in yesterday's Post a letter in reference to a statement made by contestant, testified in his behalf; and yet if all of the evidence is taken together and combined there is not enough in the record as to Calhoun and Shelby counties to permit the four members of the committee who belong to the majority to attempt to throw out any votes in those counties. They do not even hesitate, doubt, or waver as to the matter; yet two members of the committee refuse to permit even Calhoun and Shelby to stand. But Dallas County is the real place in dispute; and when we get there both wings of the majority unite, practically, and the gentleman from Massachusetts holds it up to the execration and damnation of the House. But still they can not agree as to what to do with Dallas County, except that both discard a sufficient number of votes to unseat the contestee.

There is no difference as to the result, but the fact remains, and it is an important fact here, that six members of that committee agree, after the most arduous and tedious investigation, we are told, to oust the contestee, yet they can not agree upon the methods by which it should be done. They may arrive at the same conclusions, but in doing so one branch discards rules of law that the other observes. The difference, permit me to say in the language of our distinguished chairman, between the two reports is that the report signed by the four members chisels Robbins out of more votes than the report signed by the chairman of the committee; the distinguished chairman and his one colleague chisel him out of less votes than the four. But the final result is that he is chiseled out of enough to unseat him. [Laughter.]

Now, to proceed, we will consider the evidence as to the votes in the various precincts about which there is a difference between the majority and the minority, and when considered in detail, and when we apply the rules of law to this evidence, it will be impossible to judicially or justly reach the conclusion that the contestee Robbins was not legally and honestly elected.

Mr. Speaker, I can not, of course, undertake to go through the record or do more than call attention to the facts presented by it. I desire to answer some suggestions made by the gentleman from Massachusetts who opened the discussion of this case. He has taken up the matter of the failure to procure the registration lists and based serious charges of fraud. You must remember that this case was tried exclusively on the evidence of the contestant; that not a witness has been offered by the contestee, for a reason I apprehend to be a sufficient reason, that he did not believe the evidence was sufficient, and because of a matter that I shall hereafter call your attention to, a matter of law, that he did not believe any legal evidence had been offered or taken in the case by the contestant.

Now, I ask the gentleman where it is in the record that there is any evidence that these registry lists have been demanded of the judge of probate except a letter-book copy of a letter; not an original letter, not authentic evidence, but a mere tissue paper copy taken from a letter-book—a letter-press copy—offered on page 162 by the contestant, which bears upon the question. The contestant, while he was on the stand, stated that this copy letter was in the letter-book of one J. D. Hardy, the chairman of the Republican Congressional committee in the contest of 1894; that this was all the correspondence he knew of on the subject, though this evidence, the registration lists, was in the court-house, within a few steps from where the commissioner was sitting and taking evidence, with the probate judge, the custodian of the lists, there all the time, day in and day out, the commissioner being possessed of all the powers of the law and having it at his back to compel the production of the original registry list; although he had the power and authority to use the mandate of the law and to call on the United States marshal to enforce it; although he could have commanded all the powers of the Government to bring before him the original record, they satisfy themselves with a press copy of a letter, and we do not know where it comes from, for Hardy was not, for some good reason, offered as a witness, and we are left uninformed whether this letter was ever mailed, received, or answered. Was ever a serious charge made upon so insufficient testimony? Contestant did not want them. He found out he did not want them, I apprehend. I judge so. They were left out doubtless for a purpose, for if these registration lists are in the custody of the probate court, and this contestant desired them, or the committee desires to have them before it, it being documentary evidence, they could send and have them produced.

Such is the law, and it has been often so held by this House, and if necessary to ascertain the truth the committee should have procured it. These gentlemen, who are seeking the truth and finding false registration lists, who want to find out who is elected, should want to find nothing but the truth. The power of this House was at their beck and call to send for that registration list. The House has done it in other instances. The House has sent for witnesses in other cases. The House has even sent its committee to the contested district to procure testimony in order to properly decide a case. We want the truth, whether it unseats a Democrat or seats a Republican. We want the truth judicially ascertained and judicially adjudicated. Yet with this power at their call, they wrapped themselves in stolid indifference to the truth, which can be easily found, and they content themselves with the recommendation that the Democrat give place to the Republican.

Take the testimony of Mr. Aldrich upon that point, which is to be found on page 194. Here is the letter. Here is the evidence. He is asked:

> Do you know of any other correspondence on the subject?
> A. I do not know.
> Q. Do you know whether the letter was answered or not?
> A. I do not know.

That letter is written by J. D. Hardy, chairman, October 11, 1894. J. D. Hardy, the chairman of this executive district committee, was not put on the stand, and it was well he was not; for the record discloses that he had the purse of that district, contributed by Mr. Aldrich and his associates, not only to use for legitimate campaign purposes, but to buy, to purchase signatures of election officers to returns. And I apprehend that if the records of the court in the community where J. D. Hardy lives were examined, we might find that a grand jury had already indicted him, and that he is soon to be put upon trial for the attempted bribery of men who were to hold this election.

Yet a respectable citizen, a judge of probate, a man who is sworn by the witnesses for the contestant to be above reproach, whom white Republicans like Judge Craig and Dr. McKinnon say is a man above reproach—that man is said to be unworthy of respect, entitled to no consideration, but a disgrace to the office that he holds, because of the testimony of the letter book of J. D. Hardy, the corrupt agent of the contestant, the man commissioned to go forth in this district and purchase votes and purchase election officers; this reputable officer is to be denounced as unfit to occupy this office of probate judge upon the testimony of a corrupt purchasing agent of the contestant.

That is the record. Let the gentlemen on the other side escape it if they can. Before a man whom his people have honored as they have this Alabama judge of probate, who is known by his neighbors to be a Christian man, a man of age both in years and in service, is thus denounced, the gentleman should bring somebody else here to question his integrity besides these corrupt purchasing agents of the contestant, as shown by the record.

Why, to give you an instance, W. J. Stephens testifies that Hardy, this leader of the Republicans in that district, was authorized to offer and did offer to J. H. Crocheron, the Republican inspector at Selma, $50 not to sign the election returns, and Crocheron swears to it himself. Stephens also swears that 75 per cent of the negroes of that Fourth district are purchasable, and that he belongs to the 75 per cent. Yet this is the character of witnesses, Stephens and others of like character, that we have heard to discredit the character of honorable men. I am not speaking about some of the witnesses in this record, but the record discloses that these are the witnesses, these purchasable witnesses, these witnesses who tell you that they came to testify because they have been told they will be paid; these, gentlemen of the House, are the witnesses upon whose testimony a member of this House is to lose his seat—not only that, but is to be used to destroy the good name of the people of the Fourth district of Alabama. When the gentleman brings his witnesses up before this House to attack decent people in that community, let him label them and let the House know who and what they are. Let us know who they are.

Ah, if I could transport the members on that side of the House to that Congressional district in Alabama, if I could show them this election as it was held, and could show them these witnesses as they testified, I have no doubt what they would do with the evidence. These witnesses are ignorant, all of them unlettered, except those who are sharp enough to be rascals, as the record discloses. If the House could see those witnesses, it would not accept their testimony.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is true that the minority of this committee do agree with the majority that certain precincts ought not to be counted. It is true we agree that the return of the city beat ought not to be counted as returned. It is true we agree that Summerfield and Martins and Mitchells and Carlowville and Union and those mentioned in our report should not be counted, for the reason that there were men—in one case an election officer, and no evidence is offered by the contestee to rebut it—there were men there who testified that only so many votes were cast; but these gentlemen, whom I will call faction of the majority No. 1, say that these returns ought not to be counted at all, in spite of the evidence that nobody but Democrats voted or were asked or expected to vote, and in spite of the fact that the evidence in the record shows conclusively how many votes were cast at each precinct attacked, the exact number cast at each precinct being admitted and stated by contestant in his notice of contest.

Now, I do not make that statement recklessly. I do not make it without regard to the record, but the gentlemen who compose the majority—the four members of the majority—had to discard all the votes in these precincts, to shut their eyes to all the evidence on that subject, and refuse to believe the witnesses of the contestant, for there are no other, and finally refused to believe the contestant himself. The contestant in this record states it and signs his name to it, in which he declares that at each and every one of these precincts which these gentlemen have thrown out so many votes were cast, giving the exact number at each. Not simply that people went to the polls; not people surrounding the polls, but that so many went and cast their votes. You will find upon the report of the minority, pages 3, 4, and 5, that statement set out in full, taken from the notice of the contest. Take, for instance, one of these precincts that were thrown out, called Martin, where they discarded all the votes, and the contestant in his notice of contest admits that there were 60 votes cast in that precinct.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS], the honorable chairman of this committee, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COOKE] thought proper, under the evidence in the case and the admission of this contestant, to count these 60 votes that he had admitted had been cast, and count them for the contestee; but if that rule is followed out, and the other rule adopted by the four gentlemen is followed out, and Liberty Hill is counted, and Calhoun and Shelby precincts are counted, why then these gentlemen find themselves narrowing down to a narrow majority of only 170 for Aldrich, and they know full well that when this House comes to consider the evidence as to Orrville and Liberty Hill that it should not and ought not to discard them, and this would lead to the inevitable result to keep the contestee in his seat.

We have set out the evidence in this record as to these precincts. I appeal to the gentleman on that side; I appeal to the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], who so eloquently, so plausibly, and so convincingly appealed to this House to submit to this fair division of the committee that we might have a judicial judgment on our reports. I appeal to him to turn to the record in the case before he turns this man out. I ask him to read the report as to Orrville, Liberty Hill, Oldtown, and Woodlawn, containing the evidence from the record; and if he were a judge and I appeared before him, or any other member of this House who is a lawyer, upon this case in a court instead of in the Halls of Congress, there would be no doubt about a decision as to those precincts. Let the House, if justice is what it is after, if this partisan rule is not to govern, if this new sun in the heavens of election contest is to shine in on us and guide us in our way to the truth, let them read this report.

I challenge any man on that side of the House who desires to do justice and who desires to find a true verdict in this case to read the evidence with reference to Woodlawn, to Orrville, and Liberty Hill. I will stake this case of the contestee upon their determination, and if judicially determined it must follow that the minority have made a correct determination as to them. To give them to the contestee means his retention. You have to throw them out in order to defeat him.

Now, will you gentlemen who have thrown off partisanship, you gentlemen who come proclaiming your majority already too large, you gentlemen who on the 17th of December invoked us to follow this new rule that justice might speedily be done, you gentlemen who do not desire or intend to oust any man simply because he is a Democrat, read that evidence as set out in the report? I challenge you to read. When you have read it, if you can satisfy your conscience that this contestee is not entitled to have them counted for him, unseat him, turn him out, but when it is done then indeed will the seat of every man in a close district hang by a slender thread; then, indeed, might we as well destroy the precedents that have accumulated in this House and in the courts upon this subject of contested-election cases; then, indeed, might we as well shut our eyes and follow only again that uncertain, misguiding, and deceptive rule of partisanship which you said you sought to depart from at the beginning of this session.

Mr. Speaker, I have no time to read these authorities; I have them at hand. We have taken the trouble to cite them in the minority report. They have been copied verbatim from the decisions of the court and from the decisions of this House and from learned writers upon the subject. Let us take a cursory glance at the testimony as to Woodlawn precinct, No. 3. Woodlawn gives 130 votes for Robbins, and I think 9 for Aldrich. Mark you, gentlemen, the only witnesses offered in this record, I again beg you to bear in mind, are the witnesses offered by the contestant, subpœnaed by him, and for whose credibility under the law he vouches.

Yet we are told that this witness, the inspector, Tavel, contestant's witness, is not worthy of belief, and that he is impeached by other witnesses offered by contestant.

Here, then, the majority must disregard the primary rules of the law of evidence; the hornbook rules of law as applied to every case in court must be set aside in order to disregard this evidence. Did any lawyer ever hear in the court-house of a man when he produced a witness to prove a fact impeaching that witness unless he had been entrapped? Is there a lawyer on this floor who has a right to wear worthily the title of attorney or solicitor or counsel, is there a man here who is entitled to a license to practice law, much less a judge, who can dispute a proposition that is as old as any rule of evidence ever was? Yet, gentlemen, that is what you must do in order to destroy the testimony of St. John Lewis Tavel, the inspector whom Mr. Aldrich put upon the stand to discredit the return at Woodlawn.

The contestant does not say that he was entrapped, he does not say that he was deceived, but he comes with the next witness and endeavors to impeach that man, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], who has argued this case on the part of the majority, discards Woodlawn because he does not believe the evidence of the contestant's own witness. That is a fine position to put this House in. You are asked, gentlemen, to unseat a man because you do not believe the testimony which his opponent offers to prove that he should be unseated. That is some of the new light on the rules of law that comes out of this new judicial way of trying contested-election cases. That is one of the fruits of the new departure. Lord Bacon said, speaking of the law, "Do not remove the old landmarks."

I tell you, my friends on the other side, you gentlemen who speak about judicial decisions, you have here one of the first principles of the law of evidence disregarded and set at naught and overridden by the majority of this committee in order to unseat Robbins. It reminds me of a story in a book written by a gentleman of my own State, where Uncle Remus tells a little boy about the rabbit climbing a tree. The little boy, with his mouth open and his eyes staring, asks Uncle Remus, "How is it possible for a rabbit to climb a tree?" "W'y," said Uncle Remus, "he jes 'bleeged to clim' a tree." So these gentlemen were just obliged to set at naught this rule of the law of evidence in order to unseat Robbins! [Laughter.]

They have done it so far as they can do it, but the question is, whether this House is ready to unseat him and to overturn that old rule of law. You have the power to do it, gentlemen. You can do it because there is no power to call your action in question; but when you do it, remember that it is useless to again assure us of your purpose to judicially determine election cases. That witness appears to be a decent man by the evidence. He once belonged to the Populists, but he quit them. He came back and voted the Democratic ticket at this election, for the first time in four years, I believe. He was thought to be a Populist when he was appointed; he was thought to be a Populist when he was put on the stand; but the truth did not suit our friends on the other side; so this old man, 64 years of age, is to be discredited and denounced because he does not come up to the requirements of the contestant's lawyer and swear up to the mark.

J. C. Compton, president of the senate of Alabama, was a witness for the contestant in this case, and each one of these inspectors, including St. J. Lewis Tavel, was sworn at these precincts and declared by Mr. Compton to be of the highest character and worthy of credit. Not only were they sustained by Compton, but by a number of others, among whom were Judge Craig, a Republican and former member of this House. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts denounces that man as unworthy of credit, although every respectable witness, Democrat and Republican, swears that he is a worthy gentleman and entitled to credit. And he is impeached by whom? Oh, he is contradicted and impeached by a man who is shown to be a constitutional, strolling, Keeley-cured drunkard, a man who himself declares that he did not have anything to do, a man who had run away from home and left his wife and his children to work the farm and had hung around cross-roads stores and the country grogshops.

This man's testimony, the testimony of a strolling vagabond, an admitted idler, a drunkard, rambling from place to place, not yet over the effects of the Keeley cure—the testimony of that man is to be taken to break down the testimony of the respectable gentleman who had been appointed inspector at Woodlawn. But they say R. B. Cater is to be believed. Who is R. B. Cater? A man who, the records show, is so unworthy as a citizen that his own wife and his own children will not live with him. He is a brother-in-law of St. John Lewis Tavel and they had had a family row, and the statement of this unworthy man is to be taken to discredit a gentleman who is shown by the best testimony in the case to be worthy of credit. St. John Lewis Tavel swears that every vote put into that box at Woodlawn was put in and counted by him and the others as it went in, and he says further that if Cater and Seay, to whom I have called attention, swear that only 14 votes were cast there, "they lie."

That, gentlemen of the House, is the evidence as to Woodlawn, the precinct that you are asked to throw out. Now, with the committee divided, with one branch of it saying that we ought to count 14 votes at Woodlawn and the other that we ought not to count any, I ask the members on that side of the House if it is not right to go by the testimony as it stands in the record; and if I have misstated or changed a word or a line of it I appeal to gentlemen on the other side to correct me. And I pause for that purpose. The truth is as I have stated it to you. Then, are you to accept as true the evidence in this case of the sworn inspector, of the man of credit and reliability, that 130 votes were cast for Robbins, or are you to discard it?

Now let us consider the Orrville precinct. I thought at one time we had all agreed upon that. Of 370 votes the chairman of the committee throws out all but 14.

Now, gentlemen, I submit the evidence with reference to Orrville precinct. It will be found on pages 48 and 49 and on pages 53, 54, and 55. There are only two witnesses. I will give a copy of this record to any gentleman who desires it, and while we are in search of justice and right in this case, I ask that this evidence be closely examined. It is very short.

Gentlemen of this House, I assert without fear of successful refutation that no court worthy of that appellation, from a justice of the peace up to the highest tribunal known in this country, would throw out a precinct on evidence like that; it would either refuse to count the votes that the contestant admitted were cast or throw out the whole precinct. The plurality of the majority of the committee I believe refuses to count any votes for the sitting member. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] counts 14. There are but two witnesses, and their evidence will be found on pages 48 and 49.

Both of these witnesses were farmers. One of them says that he went to the voting place at 10 or 11 or 12 o'clock—probably between 10 and 2. He went to the precinct, and being in a hurry remained only about half an hour, and then having voted he went away. All the farmers in that precinct vote usually after 12 o'clock. This man testifies that he voted between 11 and 2, as he thought, though he did not undertake to be exact. As all lawyers know who have tried cases in court, there is nothing on earth so unreliable and uncertain as testimony in regard to the time when a particular thing happened, when the witness has nothing to call his attention to the time. This witness says he went there and stayed about half an hour, and he left, he thinks, about 2 o'clock; it might have been 3; he is not certain.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROUT). The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not understand that the gentleman's time is limited.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. There are only two speeches to be made on this side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair was misinformed.

Mr. DINSMORE. I hope that my colleague on the committee will proceed.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Now, the other man (as I have said, both of these men were farmers) testifies that he went to the precinct between 2 and 3 o'clock. The first man was No. 7 on the poll list; the other, I think, was No. 264. Those are the only two witnesses present at the polls whose evidence is brought here to discredit those returns. Do not mistake what I say. Those are the only two witnesses who went to the polls who are offered in this case to testify with reference to anything which occurred at the polls. They went there and spent a few minutes. They went there about the time when it is usual to stop business for that purpose—about 12 o'clock. That is the usual time in a country precinct for the farmers and their hands to vote.

These witnesses testify that there was a large crowd of negroes around the polls. The voters in that precinct stop work about 12 o'clock and vote after that time. The negroes generally vote with their employers—the white farmers—and these white men in that precinct are all Democrats. The testimony is that there were a number of negroes around the polls who appeared to be voting, who were there for that purpose. Both these witnesses testify to that. This is the evidence upon which both wings of the majority of the committee act, and which they declare is sufficient to discredit the returns; one branch of the majority counts 14 votes of the 370 for Mr. Robbins, and the other counts nothing. That is a judicial decision which this side of the House is treated to in a judicial matter!

That is not all. On pages 53 and 54 is the testimony of J. Gilbert Johnson, a hired spy of the contestant, an informer. This House yesterday dealt very severely with hired spies even in Government service; and to-day in the trial of this case 370 honest votes in Orrville township in the Fourth district of Alabama are to be destroyed and discarded at the instance and upon the purchased evidence of a hired and discredited spy. What does this witness say? He says he was not there that day, that he was 8 miles away. He does not know a man who voted at Orrville precinct. He did not see a man who voted there. He does not know how many voted. But he takes up a poll list and he says (mark his testimony, gentlemen) as to 25 names, that there are men of similar names living in Lexington precinct, 8 miles away. One of these men is dead. He say there were men of similar names who used to live in Lexington precinct.

Mr. PITNEY. Let me ask the gentleman if there is evidence that men of that name lived in the precinct in question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not know whether there is or not.

Mr. PITNEY. It was very easy evidence to get, if the fact were so.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will find it for you; but you must remember that the contestant has the burden of the case. He is attacking the polls, and it is his duty when these men lived within 6 or 7 miles of the voting place, and where the evidence was taken, to get them and secure their testimony.

Mr. PITNEY. But it is claimed that there were no such men living in the precinct, although their names appear on the polling list in question. If such were the case, it would be easy to produce the men if they existed or to produce testimony to substantiate the fact, if it were a fact.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Permit me to read the rule of law applicable to the case.

Mr. PITNEY. I want the facts, not the law.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Let me show you the rule of law bearing on the subject; and there is not a court, there is not a tribunal in this land that ever tried an election case that ever justly threw out a precinct because on the poll list were the names of voters similar to others who live in an adjoining county or precinct. Here it is:

> Witnesses are often called to testify that persons whose names appear on the poll list as having voted are not known to be residents of the county or precincts, as the case may be.
> This kind of evidence, while admissible for what it is worth, is manifestly of little value, and must depend upon circumstances.

Again:

> Something further must be shown, direct or substantial, than that the names of persons similar to those names that appear on the poll list did not reside in the precinct or did not vote.

Now, listen to this:

> No name should be stricken from the poll list as unknown from the testimony of one witness only that no such person is known in the county or precinct; and when a man of like name is known as residing in another precinct or county, some proof direct or substantial other than the presence of such a name on the poll book will be required.

In other words, a name will not be stricken from the poll book simply because a man of the same name resides in another precinct. I refer the gentleman in this case to these citations taken from McCrary on Elections, and to the case of Letcher against Moore, page 745 of Clark and Hall's cases. That is the rule of law. The majority not only strike these names from the poll list, but discard the entire poll of the precinct.

Mr. PITNEY. But the gentleman did not answer the question I asked him.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman repeat his question?

Mr. PITNEY. Is there evidence that the eight men whose names are on this poll list do not live or did not live in that precinct?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Not one syllable of evidence of that kind.

Mr. PITNEY. Now, there is evidence that such men lived in another precinct; and the presumption is that they did not live in the precinct in question. Is that the point? Is that what is claimed?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not know what was claimed. The committee did not so say. They simply say, because the names of the witnesses appear on the list, and a man swears that other names, similar names, were in other precincts in the district, therefore they will discredit the whole return; while the other branch of the committee counts 14 votes. I do not know the reason. I have not been able to understand the reason, and nobody else has been able to do so clearly, and I apprehend no valid reason can be given for it.

Mr. DINSMORE. Will my colleague permit a single interruption?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. DINSMORE. If, as suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey, that was true that there was a number of names on the poll list, and evidence was offered to show that there were no such persons represented by either of the names in that beat, and that there was evidence of persons of that name living outside of the beat; if the evidence went further and showed conclusively that there were eight persons on the list who did not vote, doesn't the gentleman from New Jersey recognize it to be the duty of the House now, if possible, to eliminate the fraudulent votes, and count those that are shown not to be fraudulent? That is the recognized principle of law, and is it not the duty of the House now, as it was the duty of the committee, to make the necessary corrections?

Mr. PITNEY. Well, that might depend to some extent on the question presented, the exact question before the committee, and also upon the extent of the alleged fraud.

Mr. DINSMORE. I speak with reference to the abstract proposition in regard to which the gentleman made his inquiry.

Mr. PITNEY. I made the inquiry with the view of ascertaining the fact.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Any question that I can answer the gentleman I am very glad to answer, because if the House could get the exact facts before them in regard to the precincts in question as they existed they would not permit this judicial—no, not judicial, but legislative—outrage to destroy that precinct as it was returned and do an act of justice to a member of this body.

Now, they pick up the list and they hand it to J. Gilbert Johnson, and he goes over it. He swears he is not familiar with the names in Orrville precinct, and yet he undertakes to say that these 26 names on that list at Orrville that he says live in Lexington, did not live at Orrville, simply because of the fact that he did not know them. Now, I submit, under the rule of this House—which has been unvarying since the case of Letcher vs. Moore, and which is unvarying in the authorities that have been cited upon this subject—that there is no right to cast out that precinct.

The majority of the Committee on Elections were not fair when they reported that there were "26 names of dead or absent people on this poll list." There is but one man who testified about it, and that is J. Gilbert Johnson. He testified as to Charles West, whom he says is dead, but he also testified there is another Charles West now living in the same community. Yet, because one Charles West had died two years before, the committee report that 26 dead or absent voters appear on the poll list. I ask gentlemen upon the opposite side where is there another suggestion in this record that more than one man of the same name appeared upon that poll list? Where does it appear that there were two Charles Wests on that list? Gentlemen, under the rules that have been laid down it will not do to discard the return from this precinct.

Mr. PITNEY. Was there any attempt made by cross-examination to show that this witness was mistaken in the identity of the persons and that there were such persons living in the precinct, on whose poll book they appeared?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will show you, sir. Of course, in the heat of the argument, I can not turn to it at once. There was cross-examination about these men.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Johnson intended to testify that the men of these names in question did not live in that precinct, I suppose?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No; he did not testify to that. He testified that men of that name lived in Lexington precinct, 8 miles away. He says:

I am very well acquainted with Lexington beat, and only tolerably so with Orrville beat.

I say the evidence there does not show that he is acquainted with the people in Orrville beat, although he says he was acquainted with the people in Lexington beat.

Mr. PITNEY. I suppose identity of name raises a presumption of identity of person, at least until the presumption is overcome?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No; it does not do that. The gentleman is mistaken as to the rule. The rule of law is that it does not raise any presumption of identity. The case of Letcher against Moore, to which I called attention, decides the contrary; and if you were ever down in that country and undertook to be guided by similarity of names of negroes, you would soon learn that identity of name is far from being identity of person. Why, no less than 16 Andrew Jacksons have been convicted in the city court of my city, and no less than 15 George Washingtons, and so on down the list of illustrious names.

Mr. PITNEY. Is the name of Green Hitt a common name?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Any sort of a name is a common name down there with the negroes.

Mr. PITNEY. Is Bing Allen a common name?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes; that is an ordinary name—Bing Allen or Bing anything—it is but an abbreviation of "Bingham," I suppose. We have two men in our town called Dollar Bill. They are known everywhere, by the police and everybody else, as Dollar Bill; and one Dollar Bill has been indicted and convicted no less than three times in the criminal court there as Dollar Bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. A bad Dollar Bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes, a bad Dollar Bill.

Mr. PITNEY. I think the gentleman will find some pretty peculiar names in this record.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes, and you will find some very peculiar names in every negro community that you go into. I ask the gentleman if he would destroy a whole precinct return, because 25 men with peculiar names voted at it? Is that any evidence that the election officers committed fraud?

Mr. PITNEY. I think there is evidence of the grossest fraud, and evidence of a conspiracy to commit it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Where is it in that precinct? Point it out, and I will give you all the time you want to point it out. I ask you or the majority to point out the gross fraud in that precinct, because that is the one I am discussing. Examine the record, and then make up your mind from the evidence.

Mr. PITNEY. Excuse me. I do not say that I have made up my mind, understand. On the contrary, I have not.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say that. I said you could not point it out in the record; and if I said anything else, I withdraw it.

Mr. PITNEY. I should not be listening to the gentleman, if I had made up my mind in advance.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I know that, and I assure you, if you understood me to say that, I was not intending to say it; but I meant to say that the record in that particular district does not show that there was any fraud or conspiracy there.

Mr. PITNEY. You do not deny that there were gross frauds in other districts?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not, and have not done it, and if the gentleman reads the report he will find that we do not deny it, and I stated so. Wherever the fraud has been shown, in every single precinct where it was shown, we have done what it was our duty to do and what every other man should have done—discarded the returns. It can not be shown that in this report of the minority a single precinct has been counted as returned when fraud was shown, nor that a fraudulent vote has been counted by us for contestee.

It may be well to call attention here to the rule of law that, no matter how gross the fraud, if we can find from the evidence the number of voters and how they voted and who they voted for, we ought to count them. Now, I ask this House if it was not the duty of this election committee when they said there were 26 dead and absent votes cast at Orrville, as shown by Johnson, because it was shown that there were men of similar names in another part of the county or adjoining precinct, that they ought not to have been satisfied to deduct that 26 from that poll?

Enough about that. I come now to Liberty Hill, and the record as to that precinct is printed in full in the report. At Liberty Hill there are only two witnesses, Kline and Rothschilds.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman state that the majority of the Republicans do not reject the return in Liberty Hill?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I have so stated.

Mr. MOODY. I beg pardon.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Four of the Republicans on the committee agreed that this precinct ought to stay in. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COOKE] think it ought to go out, and deduct from Robbins 244 votes from that precinct. Now, let us see what the evidence as to that precinct is in this report. This has been copied verbatim from the report, and I will submit that to the House. Here is the testimony of Kline, a Republican, a man who went down to Alabama from Pennsylvania. He was not a manager here; he was a hundred yards away. He was the depot agent, and he could not see what was going on at the polls, because there were cotton houses between him and the election precinct, and he did not know how many people voted there. There may have been 50, or 100, or 274; and that is all.

Rothschilds, who lived in Selma, testifies that he is acquainted with the 30 whites and the 300 negroes living in the beat. He also testifies that the Republican party had not organized in that county or beat. They had less organization now than when he lived there—at Liberty Hill—some five years before; and the evidence in that record from black and white, especially from some of the executive committeemen, one executive committeeman, John H. Crocheron, is that the negroes of Dallas County were offended with Mr. Aldrich, because he had two headquarters down there, one for the negroes and the other for the Populists and Republicans. They did not like it. He was a man of means. He had been put up as a candidate to carry that district, and instead of going down into that district and appealing to the voters to vote for him in Dallas, they issued a circular requesting the colored people and the Republicans not to vote. Even such stanch Republicans as Craig did not vote. The idea was that the negroes were not to vote, and nobody was to vote but Democrats.

That was the condition of affairs that we had, not only in Liberty Hill, but in every precinct in that county. Gentlemen who are familiar with the character of the colored voters know very well that the man who turns his back on them will not receive their votes and the man who seeks them will secure their votes. Aldrich surrendered in Dallas County. He abandoned his organization. He did not endeavor to get a single vote from the Republican side. He advised them to stay away and issued a circular in which he said: "You don't vote; the Republicans are going to carry Congress and we are going to contest. Stay away and don't vote." These people down there did not like it, according to the testimony. They went out and voted for Robbins, the man who was kind to their race.

Carmichael, an intelligent colored school-teacher, says he and others voted for Robbins, a number of them did, because Robbins had been kind to his race. Here was a man, a candidate, their neighbor, their friend, who had been kind to their race. He was seeking their votes; he was appealing to them as his neighbors, and was asking them to vote for him. Here was another who simply held his head high, put the negro headquarters off in a back room and the mixed Republican and Populist headquarters in a well-furnished apartment. They told the negroes they did not need their votes. That was the spectacle; that was the policy adopted by this contestant and his friends in Dallas County.

Gentlemen, any man can see at once that when the forces were deserted by its leaders, when they were left to drift where they pleased, ignorant and unlearned as most of them were, it was but natural for them to support that candidate who was their neighbor, whom they knew, and who had been the generous friend of their race. And yet, the only reason that they throw out Liberty Hill, so far as the minority of the majority are concerned, is because there were only 30 white votes there, the balance being negroes.

I might go on through this list of precincts, but time will not permit. You will find upon investigation of the report that wherever it has been shown by witnesses who were present at a precinct that more votes were returned than were cast, the minority have disregarded those returns and counted only the votes proven to have been cast. Take Oldtown; the evidence is about the same—but I will not rehearse that case, because it is set out in the report, and I will leave it for my colleague on the committee. So that you find on investigation that we do what the law says we shall do, namely, purge this ballot of every vote that ought to be thrown out. The rule of law is laid down in the case of Washburn against Voorhees, and elsewhere in the books, that no pains are to be spared, no examinations are to be avoided, nothing is to be neglected that will discover what the vote was, and we have complied with that rule, and have counted for the contestee only the number of votes that the contestant himself admits in his notice of contest were cast at the several precincts.

Now, gentlemen, when you take that fact, in connection with the theory of this case that the Republicans were not asked or expected to vote, and when you take into account also the political complexion of the people who did vote, you certainly ought to give to Robbins as many votes as the contestant himself admits were cast at those precincts.

I come now, finally, to the Selma precinct; but before taking that up I desire to say a few words in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] with reference to the appointment of inspectors. On pages 229, 230, and 231 you will find a list of the names of men whose appointment as inspectors was requested and a list of those that were appointed. The trouble about those that were not appointed, as requested, was that the law of Alabama required that one of the inspectors at each poll should be of the opposite political party to the dominant party. Mr. Aldrich furnished a list of those that he desired appointed, but in that list he did not say whether they were Democrats, Republicans, or Populists, and in a number of cases they were appointed as requested; but in all those cases the same man was appointed, either as a Populist or a Republican, as the list shows. Mr. Aldrich himself testifies as to the men he requested to have appointed that he did not know what their political faith was, and therefore, if the list that he furnished the probate judge did not comply with the law, the judge was under no obligation to appoint those men. Furthermore, there is no law which requires the probate judge to appoint men who are nominated by the candidates.

I pass now to the Selma precinct for a few minutes.

Mr. MOODY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY. Is it not a fact that the law of Alabama requires that each contesting party shall be represented at the polls by at least one inspector?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes, sir; I have so stated.

Mr. MOODY. Is it not a further fact that by the action of the probate judge and his associates that right was not granted to the Republican candidate?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understand that it was granted in every precinct where there was a Republican or a Populist.

Mr. MOODY. I do not understand it so, and if the gentleman will point out any fact in the record which controls the evidence to the contrary, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Take the city of Selma——

Mr. MOODY. In my remarks I made three exceptions, among which was Selma.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Well, I can not go through with all these now. I only know this, that the record discloses, where evidence was taken on the subject, and any question was asked about it, that there was either a Populist or a Republican inspector. That is the case, I think, wherever that point was inquired about. The evidence on the part of the contestant is silent as to what were the politics of the men that he asked to have appointed. He says that he did not even know what their politics were himself, and how could he expect the judge of probate to appoint men, under the law, which required that they should be of certain political parties, when he did not know their politics.

Mr. MOODY. I have examined the evidence with respect to each of the precincts other than those I expressly excepted, and I find that there is positive evidence that the inspectors in all those precincts were of the Democratic party.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is true; and you will find also that in those precincts there was not a single solitary white Republican. Mr. Aldrich was the Republican nominee, and the proof is that there were so many white people, 30, 40, or 50, and not a single white Republican among them.

Mr. MOODY. One more question: Does not the gentleman remember that the Republican candidate found for each precinct in Dallas County three men whom he suggested for appointment, and that the judge did not appoint any of the three?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes; but those men were not Republicans. Mr. Aldrich himself, on page 192 of the record, swears that he did not know what was their politics. Now, the law required the judge to appoint a Republican and a Democrat at each precinct, but Mr. Aldrich himself did not know whether these men were Republicans or not.

Mr. MOODY. They were supporters of Mr. Aldrich, and good enough Republicans for him.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. But he does not swear himself that they were Republicans. He was the Republican candidate, and he had no right to say that the judge should appoint a Democrat or a Populist. Mr. Crocheron, who was appointed at one precinct, was a delegate for Mr. Aldrich at the Calera convention, which nominated Aldrich.

The probate judge at Selma appointed two Democrats, and he also appointed James H. Crocheron, the Republican member of the executive committee of Dallas County, who nominated Aldrich and voted for him on the 6th day of November, 1894. He had been chairman of the committee. That is the wrong the probate judge did—he appointed Crocheron. And it turns out that they denounce Crocheron because he would not agree, at the instigation of Bill Stevens and J. D. Hardy, to refuse to sign the returns from Selma precinct.

Here is the evidence on page 182: Crocheron swears that he was there; he swears that as to those 2,002 votes he helped to count every one of them and that they went into the box. What more does he swear? He swears on page 185 that after he had refused to sign the return, Mr. Bowman, the attorney for the contestant, in the presence of H. G. Kornegae and George R. Mason and Bob Mason, offered him $100 to swear that there were only 762 ballots cast at Selma precinct. Bill Stevens swears that the party was authorized to pay $50 to Crocheron to keep him from signing those returns. And now, because this matter is disclosed, because Crocheron did sign the returns, because he comes up and says they were correct, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] mildly characterizes him as a commercial and purchasable personage. Well, if a man who did not take a bribe which was offered him is a commercial character, what is the character of those gentlemen who offered the bribe to him? Is the bribe taker or the bribe refuser any worse when it comes to credibility than the bribe giver or the bribe offerer?

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman allow me one more question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he believes that Crocheron told the truth?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. He is your witness, is he not?

Mr. MOODY. I ask the gentleman whether he believes that Crocheron told the truth?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No; and I do not believe that a great many more of these witnesses told the truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOODY. Take one at a time.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Now, I want to ask the gentleman whether he believes that Bill Stevens, the chairman of that Republican executive committee, told the truth?

Mr. MOODY. I do not; and for that reason I did not disturb the precinct as to which Stevens testified. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes; but he testified about Selma also. I guess the gentleman and I are about even on the question of beliefs.

Gentlemen of this House, J. H. Crocheron is an educated, smart, active member of the Republican party, one of its accredited agents in Alabama and one of its leaders. W. J. Stevens is chairman of one of its chief committees. He has been elected a delegate to the St. Louis convention. And gentlemen on the other side will not believe these accredited and intelligent officials of the Republican party—men of high standing in that party—and yet they strike down the returns made by honest men on the testimony of ignorant negroes, led by Stevens and Crocheron.

But as to Selma precinct. The proof is that there are from 1,250 to 1,400 white Democratic votes in Selma. Judge Craig, the leader of the Republican party there, says so. It is in proof that 1,100 white men voted in a Democratic primary there in August, 1894. It is proved by Judge Craig and all these other witnesses that there was an active canvass there; that Mr. Robbins's friends had hacks and other conveyances carrying the voters to the polls. The voting continued nine hours. And we allow Mr. Robbins 767 votes upon the evidence. So does the gentleman from New York, Judge DANIELS. The gentlemen with whom the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] raises his hands against fraud, the gentlemen who are in favor of fair elections and honest counts, what do they do? With an admitted voting population of 1,500 white citizens of Selma, all Democrats with but very rare exceptions, the gentleman from Massachusetts counts three votes for Robbins. We have an admission on the part of the contestant that 767 votes were cast at that precinct. Now, gentlemen of the House, are you prepared to treat in that way the ballots of the citizens of that precinct? You have the power to do it; but the dictates of right and justice and judicial impartiality forbid you to do it.

Before leaving Selma I wish to say, what I was about to say when the gentleman from Massachusetts interrupted me, that when Crocheron swore that he was offered $100 by Mr. Bowman, a statement which will be found on page 185 of the record—he testifies that this offer was made in the presence of three men named G. H. Kornegae, George R. Mason, and Bob Mason—Crocheron swears that Bowman offered him $100 to swear that there were only 742 votes cast—Mr. Bowman, the lawyer, gets up and says that the fact as stated did not occur; that some conversation occurred about paying a debt that Hardy owed Crocheron. But I ask this House whether when Crocheron stated that George R. Mason and Bob Mason and Kornegae were present at the time when this offer was made by Mr. Bowman, Aldrich's attorney—this offer of a bribe not only to certify falsely to returns or not to certify at all, but to swear to what was not true—I ask this House whether it was not the duty of Mr. Aldrich under such circumstances to show by those three other witnesses who are stated to have been present that no such thing occurred? There are their names—the two Masons and Kornegae are named on page 182. We hear on this floor about a record being full of corruption, about pollution. Gentlemen of the House, you will find upon examination that this record, if the witnesses are to be believed, teems and rots with corruption and attempted corruption in order to induce witnesses to give false testimony in this case for the contestant.

But, Mr. Speaker, to proceed to the discussion of the question I left off a moment ago. All the evidence in the case taken in Dallas County was taken before a notary public who was appointed for the county of Shelby. The witnesses were sworn by him, and the evidence was taken in Dallas County, and the contestee makes the objection that that is not evidence, because a notary public under the laws of Alabama does not have any jurisdictional power to swear a witness or take testimony outside of the county for which he was appointed. The minority of the committee have reported that that point was well taken. The minority of the committee think that the notary of public, who under the laws of Alabama is a local officer merely, whose jurisdiction to administer oaths or take the testimony of a witness is circumscribed and limited to the confines of the county to which he was appointed, that the notary public, under such circumstances, has no right to go outside of the jurisdiction of his own county into a neighboring county and pretend to swear the people whom he undertakes to swear any more than any private individual might have done.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption just there?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Was that objection taken at the time that these witnesses were being sworn?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Does that appear in the record?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Not only that, but the objection was taken before the notary himself, and the motion was also made before the Committee on Elections to suppress all of this testimony so taken before the notary.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in that same connection. I notice in the report of the majority of the committee a reference is made to a case reported in 2 Bartlett, where it was held that it was competent to take such testimony, and that there was, therefore, a precedent established by the House. I have not examined the case myself. Does it bear out the committee in their citation—the reference made to the case quoted in 2 Bartlett's Report?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes, sir; I have so stated, I think, before. That was the case of Voorhees vs. Washburn.

Mr. LACEY. I only wanted your view as to whether it bore out the statement made by the majority of the committee in their report.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes, sir. In the Voorhees and Washburn contest, 2 Bartlett, 54, I think it is; I can give the gentleman the citation exactly in a few moments if he desires it—a case arising in Illinois I believe——

Mr. ROYSE. No; it was an Indiana case, and came up to Congress on a contest from the Terre Haute district.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes; an Indiana case, and it was held that a mayor of an Indiana town could take depositions in the contested-election case outside of the city. But there are certain considerations that we must take into view in connection with this case. The Voorhees and Washburn contested-election case arose out of an election held in November, 1864. As all know, there were peculiar conditions existing in this country at that time. The condition of affairs existing at that time in this country was one of armed conflict. There was an excited country, a country amid the clash of arms. We were in the midst of internecine strife.

A Democrat in the House of Representatives was rare, and the election in Indiana was held during the war, and the contest was decided in 1865, I believe, at the end of the civil war. Men's passions had not at that time cooled. The reverberation of the guns at Appomattox had not died away, and the Republican party was in control of the House of Representatives, not only as a victorious party at the polls, but as a victorious party in the accomplishment of its views with regard to putting an end to slavery and in crushing the Confederacy. It was a bad time for the judicial determination of any question. Men, in order to carry out their political views, were in no condition to decide judicial questions, and I do not attach blame to them for it, for we are all human at last, whether we sit on that side of the House or this; and when the case of Washburn against Voorhees was decided the war and civil strife had hardly been ended. We know that at that time the antagonisms against Mr. Voorhees were still in existence, and even outlasted the war twenty years at least; and it is not strange, then, that a Republican majority—there was a divison of opinion on the committee in reference to the question—that a Republican majority should determine, when necessary to seat Mr. Washburn and unseat Mr. Voorhees, that a mayor had such power under the statute, and that decision was rendered under the circumstances to which I have called attention.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will permit a further inquiry, is it not a fact that the statutes of the United States provide that any notary public living in the Congressional district may take the testimony in a contested-election case?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not so understand the law.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will permit me, section 110 provides:

When any contestant or returned member is desirous of obtaining testimony respecting a contested election, he may apply for a subpœna to either of the following officers who may reside within the Congressional district in which the election to be contested is held: First, any judge of any court of the United States; second, any chancellor judge or justice of a court of record of any State; third, any mayor, recorder, or intendant of any town or city; fourth, any register in bankruptcy or notary public.

Mr. BOATNER. That does not confer authority on a notary public outside of the county where he assumes to act——

Mr. NORTHWAY. But it says in the Congressional district.

Mr. BOATNER. Because it has been held by the courts that Congress can not confer authority on a State officer which is not conferred by the laws of the State.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But if the Federal statutes provide that any man may take the testimony or administer the oath?

Mr. BOATNER. But, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, suppose that the statutes provided that any notary public or clerk of a court could administer the oath and take the testimony? The gentleman would not maintain that the clerk of the court of County A could go and administer oaths and take testimony within the jurisdiction of the clerk of the court of County B.

Mr. NORTHWAY. While it does not enlarge the right of the individual as a notary public, it designates such individuals as have the powers to administer oaths.

Mr. BOATNER. But when the notary public passes beyond the line of the county for which he is appointed he ceases to be a notary public and is no longer a notary public.

Mr. NORTHWAY. There can be no doubt about the statute.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Is the gentleman through?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I am through.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I am glad to answer the gentleman's question. Mr. Speaker, upon this point there is very considerable doubt. There was enough doubt about it to create a division of opinion in the Washburn-Voorhees case at the time and under the circumstances that I relate.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me a question there?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman from Georgia know of any authority or any law under which witnesses could be convicted of perjury for false swearing upon an affidavit taken before an officer out of the jurisdiction or territory where he has jurisdiction to administer an oath?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I was coming to that. Mr. Speaker, in 131 United States and in 107 United States will be found two cases, and in 138 United States another case, which will answer the question of the gentleman upon this point. It is there decided that an affidavit made before a notary public who had no authority to administer an oath at the time and place where he administered it could not be used to convict of perjury the person who made the affidavit. The cases were identical, and it is for that reason that no witness who was sworn here before this notary public could be convicted, if he had sworn to a falsehood, in any court, that we object to permitting a man who was not an officer to administer the oath.

Mr. BRUMM. Nobody denies that proposition. The only proposition is, had he jurisdiction here?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. We say he had not, and I propose to show it. I say the law of Alabama under which these notaries public are appointed is that their jurisdiction to swear witnesses is confined to the county in which they are appointed, and the supreme court of Alabama, in 102 Alabama Reports, has so decided. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases which I have cited, have also decided that.

Mr. BRUMM. Suppose the statute had designated a private person? Does the gentlemen still contend that that private person would be limited by anything except the limits of the Congressional district for which the national statute provided he should be competent to administer oaths?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman is supposing that the Congress of the United States would do a thing so foolish as to appoint a man to swear the witnesses who had no authority to administer an oath. The only way in which gentlemen can uphold this proposition is by putting an extreme supposititious case. I do not think Congress would ever say that a man who was not clothed with any authority to administer oaths could administer an oath. Such a proposition would be ridiculous, and if it is not unparliamentary I will say to my friend that his question is absurd.

Mr. LACEY. Right in that connection, this contestant having followed the decisions of the court in which his case is to be tried in his selection of an officer, the question is whether his evidence should now be thrown out. That is the point I want to hear you upon, in connection with this decision to which you have referred.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Why, sir, I do not know whether they knew about that or not. I think they found out about it after they came up here. Be that as it may, the point was made to the first witness that was offered that this officer was a notary public for Shelby County, and that he had no authority to take evidence in Dallas County. That objection was made to the swearing of the very first witness. The United States statute does not appoint any notary public. It simply recognizes the officer that the State appoints as an officer to administer oaths. Suppose the notary public did not have authority to administer oaths in Alabama, could he administer an oath in a Congressional election case? Why, certainly not.

But I can not detain the House, except to refer members to these decisions in 107, 131, and 138 United States Supreme Court Reports. They are cited in the report of the minority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that being so, believing that this evidence was not worth the paper on which it was written, believing that under the law of Alabama, as lawyers there understood it, and as the contestee understood it, as the supreme court of that State had declared it, that this evidence was just as if it had been taken before a private person—no other evidence was offered except the evidence of the contestant—we felt it to be our duty to discard that evidence. The contestee, believing and feeling convinced that that evidence was not proper evidence, but simply the statement of private persons before another private person, offered no evidence, and doubtless followed the opinion of his counsel and the decision of his supreme court in concluding that it was not necessary to offer evidence when no legal evidence had been submitted by the contestant.

But we can not decide this case on the neglect of contestee to take testimony. The case of Follett vs. Delano, reported in 1 Bartlett, decides that although the contestee may by silence or acquiescence do that which may estop him, the House will not apply the rule of estoppel when the interests of the people of the district are involved. This House decided unanimously that back of the contestee and back of the contestant are the rights of the people of the district to have the question settled, not by the conduct simply of the contestant or the contestee, but by the evidence, and this House is trying the right of the people to have the right man and the man of their selection represent them in the Halls of Congress.

In the case just referred to the committee reported and the House decided:

No confession of the sitting member, however it might bind him personally, can place the contestant in the seat, unless he is the choice of eth majority, nor deprive that majority of its rightful representation.

The House should require proof that the sitting member has not and that the contestant has a majority of legal votes before unseating the one or admitting the other, however the sitting member may have seen fit to conduct his own case in a contest.

Now, that being so, it is the duty of this House so to speak, if it can do so, to undertake to arrive at the truth in this case and the right of men to occupy seats upon this floor independent of the parties to the contest. So I appeal to this House to take this rule laid down, as I say, in the Follett and Delano case, and determine it in order that the people of the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama may be entitled to its Representative as they voted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg the pardon of the House for undertaking as I have, in the earnest and imperfect way that I must necessarily have done, to present this report of the minority. The minority have endeavored to find the truth. We have not counted a vote that ought not to be counted. They have, however, set their faces firmly against an effort to disfranchise the voters in these precincts, and say that, as they have not been successfully attacked, they ought to be counted. I appeal to this House again, and at last, before it shall determine to throw out the white Democratic vote of Dallas County, with its 3,000 white Democratic votes, that they will weigh well this evidence before they give this seat to the contestant.

Mr. Speaker, we have been charged with all sorts of wrongs in Alabama. It is said that frauds and outrages have been committed. In some cases that is true, but in my judgment that time has passed except in sporadic cases. You find them in the North and South. Old things have passed away, and whatever may have been the wrongs that have been committed, if any were committed, in elections, my judgment is they are a thing of the past. However perfectly you may make the law, however strongly you may denounce fraud, you will never be able, North or East, West or South, to have absolute freedom from some wrong in elections. The old order of things has passed away, and I never have nor do I expect to stand upon the floor of any legislative body or upon the stump or anywhere else and uphold fraudulent votes in an election, but with that conviction and a stern determination and unalterable purpose to find out the truth in this case from the record I have pursued that course, and I stand here to close this opening on the part of the minority, and tell you that this record discloses the fact that the man who is returned is entitled to the seat upon the votes that actually were cast.

Further, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, if you are to adopt the majority report and turn the contestee from the Halls of this House, you will but add another vote to that already overwhelming majority, but you add to the partisan record another wrong in turning out a man who was elected and in placing in his seat a man who could not show the honest votes that elected him. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DANIELS. I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY].

Mr. LINNEY Mr. Speaker, it has been said that this Congress is to be a do-nothing Congress. My humble judgment is, that if this House shall investigate carefully and determine correctly and accurately the numerous contested-election cases before it, it will have performed a duty to the country of greater importance than the settlement of any question that has ever claimed the attention of a deliberative legislative body in this Republic for the last half century.

Everything, Mr. Speaker, pales into utter insignificance in comparison with the purity of the ballot box. There is, sir, a very close resemblance between the highest crime known to criminal law and this crime of placing impure hands upon the ballot box.

Justice Blackstone tells us, in treating of the crime of high treason, that the distinction between petty treason and high treason is this: "When a wife, for instance, or any party to certain domestic relations, commits a crime against her lord the husband, that is petty treason, because it involves treachery; but," says the author, "when disloyalty raises its crest and strikes at the law itself, or at majesty itself, then it is designated high treason, by way of distinction. Therefore," says this author, "whoever compasses the death of the king in possession of the throne is visited with the death penalty, and the blood of the culprit is so tainted that it loses its quality of inheritance."

Why is it, Mr. Speaker? It is because the king, in possession of the throne, was the sole representative of sovereignty, the sole representative of power. Not so in a Republic, Mr. Speaker. Here we have no sole representative of power. The ballot box is the instrumentality through which the sovereign power is exercised. When President Garfield fell at the hands of the assassin no blood was tainted on the part of the culprit. The blood of Guiteau did not lose its inheritable quality. Why? Because even the President of the United States in this Republic was not the sole representative of power, and the culprit, the felon, was only guilty of murder, and forfeited his life. Every assault upon the ballot box, therefore, is closely akin to high treason. It is, in my humble opinion, the red-eyed daughter of high treason, because it is an assault upon the life of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, this country has been warned by the best thought in it on two different occasions against the disposition in certain sections of the Republic, or the disposition generally, to lay corrupt hands upon the ballot box, and these warnings, coming from two great leaders of the two great parties of the country, to wit, President Harrison on the one hand and Henry Watterson on the other, ought to teach this American Congress that the ballot box should be deemed as sacred as the Ark of the Covenant, and that the hand that touches it profanely should wither and perish as certainly as the hand of Uzza withered and fell by the edict of the Almighty when it touched the ark when the oxen stumbled. [Applause.] President Harrison, in his message of December 6, 1892, propounded the following interrogatory to the American Congress:

> Is it not time that we should come together upon the high plane of patriotism while we devise methods that shall secure the right of every man qualified by law to cast a free ballot and give to every such ballot an equal vote in choosing our public officers and in directing the policy of the Government?

No less patriotic were the utterances of Henry Watterson at the World's Fair at Chicago. Standing, as he did, before the greatest assemblage of people that ever gave an American orator audience, that representative of democratic thought in this country raised himself to the highest point of unselfish patriotism and there proclaimed to the representatives of the various nationalities of the world the only infirmity that threatened the peace, the stability, and the integrity of the Republic. Said the great orator on that memorable occasion:

> Slavery has perished amid the war flames, and the mirage of the Confederacy has vanished, never again to return. But there is one crime, there is one infirmity, in our system which threatens the peace and integrity of the Republic. That infirmity is a peculiar form of corruption touching the purity of the ballot box. That infirmity has already pressed the danger line.

This is given from memory, not having the speech before me.

But he expressed the hope that with expanding intelligence and quickened patriotism that peculiar and most dangerous form of corruption would be pressed below the danger line and the Republic saved.

Mr. Speaker, when these great leaders of the best thought of the Republic, President Harrison being a splendid representative of the Republican idea and Henry Watterson a splendid representative of the Democratic idea—I say when those two great representative men thus promulgated this lofty sentiment of patriotism, little did they think that right here in these United States, in the State of Alabama, in ten "beats," there would be 3,177 fraudulent votes cast in one election. [Applause.] This is a piece of experience hitherto unknown in the history of the Republic. From the time that the organized American patriots at the close of the Revolution ceased belching forth the missiles that destroyed the enemy down to the present time our history has not presented anything at all like it. I said, Mr. Speaker, that there were 3,177 fraudulent votes cast in ten beats. Three thousand Krupp guns were those, manned and turned against the nation's life; three thousand efforts to commit treason, or to commit a crime that is closely akin to it. And the evidence in this case not only discloses that fact, but the admissions of the minority of the committee disclose it and make it a fact established by the admission of every single member of the committee, and, if not established in that way, proven to a mathematical certainty by mere calculation.

Now, let us see if I can not show this. On page 7 of the report of the minority I find this most remarkable statement:

> We come now to consider the vote in Dallas County. We are convinced that in the precincts of Summerfield, Martins, Lexington, River, Union, Elm Bluff, Carlowville, Boykins, Mitchells, and Selma or City beat the official returns are unreliable, and therefore agree with the majority of the committee that the result in these beats must be arrived at from the evidence.

Why arrived at from the evidence? Why these official returns unreliable? Because they had been assailed by the proof offered by the contestant in this case, unanswered by the contestee, upon allegations straight, clear, and to the point, of fraudulent practices and fraudulent methods in the election in those 10 beats, and the minority of the committee, after careful investigation, making their report, represented by the learned gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], than whom there are not two greater or purer or better men in this House, were forced by the weight of the testimony to pen this remarkable piece of evidence admitting fraud to the extent of three thousand and some odd votes.

How do I reach that conclusion? By taking the number that you found that he actually got—five hundred and some odd votes—from the majority returned by the election officers, and it leaves three thousand and some odd votes, thereby establishing to a mathematical certainty that in 10 beats in Dallas County there were fraudulent votes to the number of over 3,000.

What, then, is the result? Here are three reports. No. 1 says that there are 3,000 fraudulent votes; No. 2 says there are something over 2,000; No. 3, 4,000. So the question to be determined is merely the quantum of fraud. The three reports, taken in their regular order, only establish the degrees of fraud—fraud, more fraud, most fraud.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I know that the gentleman from North Carolina does not wish to misrepresent the views of the minority of the committee; and he will allow me to deny that we have contended or conceded that there were 4,000 fraudulent votes.

Mr. LINNEY. Three thousand, I said.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understood the gentleman to say 4,000.

Mr. LINNEY. Oh, no; my friend did not hear me aright.

Mr. DINSMORE. Allow me to make this suggestion. I am sure my friend from North Carolina does not want to misrepresent the minority of the committee.

Mr. LINNEY. Certainly not, my friend.

Mr. DINSMORE. The report of the minority does not admit that there were 3,000 fraudulent votes. It admits that the returns from the precincts named must be thrown out because they were unreliable; but if the gentleman would read further from our report he would find we have stated that while we only claim seven hundred and seventy-odd votes as cast for the contestee in the City beat, there were many more votes cast for him, but we could not ascertain how many. We never made any admission anywhere as to the number of fraudulent votes, and our report does not show that any number of votes were admitted to have been fraudulent. We admit, however, that the returns were unreliable, and therefore the contestee had to be deprived of a great number of votes that were actually cast for him.

Mr. LINNEY. I thank my friend for that statement. Now, let me see whether I can not refute the gentleman by his own figures. According to the reports of the election officers, the contestee was elected by a majority of 3,736 votes. Is not that so? Now, according to the report of the minority, signed by HUGH A. DINSMORE, CHARLES L. BARTLETT, and SMITH S. TURNER, the contestee is elected by 559 majority. Now, subtracting 559 from 3,736—the number reported by the election officers—and it leaves 3,177 fraudulent votes—more than I said. [Laughter and applause.] I was in error, Mr. Speaker; but the error was against myself. I do not say that you gentlemen of the minority come in and say, "We admit that much fraud," but you adopt certain figures. And, my friends, figures never lie when in the hands of honest gentlemen like those on this committee; and when the figures establish a fact, it is established so that there can be no further controversy about it. As to moral reasoning, a different view prevails, because in moral reasoning much depends upon the processes of the intellect by which you reach a certain conclusion; but in the employment of figures you proceed upon mathematical premises, and when you reach a conclusion it is absolutely certain.

So, sir, we have here this astonishing piece of testimony. I would to God that I could take my hand and wipe it out, and that it could never appear in American politics to be used in foreign nations, in civilized countries, in Christian lands against this glorious system of ours—that here where the Bible is read, here where the Christian religion is believed in, here where patriotism is thought to grow deeper and stronger than in any other section of the world, we have to admit, and that admission, too, comes from the greatest men of the North or the South—such men as my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] and my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]—that there are over 3,000 fraudulent votes in 10 beats in 1 county! [Applause.] Why, sir, the like of that can not be found on earth or in the heavens or on the north side of the east corner of hell. [Laughter.] I do not believe any such thing ever before happened or was known to President Harrison or Henry Watterson when they sounded the note of warning to the American people.

Yet it is argued here by my friend the gentleman from Georgia that we are put in an awkward position—as awkward as the position of the man who tried to prove that a rabbit climbed because he must. He must prove it, says the gentleman. By similar reasoning the gentleman descends a muddy slope and drifts along with 3,000 fraudulent votes. There is no escape from the statement that he has taken that position. I say this without meaning any disrespect to anybody.

There is one matter which, although not exactly in my line of argument, I must refer to before it escapes my mind. I believe upon reflection that the majority of this committee did not do exactly right; they have not found enough fraudulent votes. If we had stuck rigidly to the law and to what I believe to be justice in this matter we would have thrown out Pences township. Why, sir, here is the oath which the officers in that township took. I want gentlemen to listen to it:

You do solemnly swear that you will hold this election according to law to the best of your knowledge, so help us over the fence.

[Laughter.]

That is there; you can see it for yourself. I wish every member of this House before he gives his vote on this question would take a look at it. If he can not see it he ought to have a good, strong pair of glasses, because the most of men would be almost unwilling to believe it. "So help us over the fence!" [Laughter and applause.] What does it mean? Will you gentlemen tell me?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow a further interruption?

Mr. LINNEY. Why, certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Did not every member of the committee, including yourself, say that these votes ought to be counted, because the witnesses that you put upon the stand testified that the votes returned by them were actually cast and that they were counted as cast?

Mr. LINNEY. Why, certainly; I admit that we counted them. I have just said so, and I have just said, too, that on reflection we ought not to have done so. We gave you a great deal more than you are entitled to.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Well, will the gentleman allow another question?

Mr. LINNEY. Well, I did not interrupt you, I believe.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not wish, of course, to interrupt the gentleman without his consent, but I will not do so again.

Mr. LINNEY. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does not the gentleman, who is a lawyer, know that it is a rule of law that, whether the election officers are sworn or not sworn, and it does not matter what sort of oath is administered to them, if they honestly conduct the election, the votes honestly cast can and ought to be counted?

Mr. LINNEY. Well, I see you do not know all the law. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Well, that may be, but I will never learn anything from you, anyhow. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINNEY. No, sir; I am satisfied that you will not. You will never learn from anybody. [Great laughter and applause.]

I do not know whether the gentleman has overlooked that portion of the report or not. I do not know whether he has looked into the case very thoroughly in one regard, but it is clearly enunciated in Twyne's case, which has no doubt been quoted before you as a judge—the case is reported in Smith's Leading Cases—a case that has been followed and respected and uniformly held to be law, and good law, by the leading judges of the land; a case which dealt with a question of fraud, the very matter of this case. It was held in that case that unusual covenants or statements of the deed may become a badge of fraud, as in Twyne's case, where the deed recited that it was made for "good consideration and is without taint of fraud." The courts held that that language was such an unusual declaration on the face of the paper itself that it was a badge of fraud and shifted the laboring oar on the party holding the deed to show that it was not tainted with fraud. Now, that very same principle applies to this case, and if the judge had read that case I have no doubt he would just at that point have suggested that Pence precinct ought to be thrown out.

Now, if the officer of election did not take the customary oath, I do not claim that that vitiates the box. I do not say that it does. But, Mr. Speaker, it does have something to do with the matter in hand. We have all concluded that these votes should stand against the contestant. Now, recognizing the principle established in Twyne's case, the recitals in the oath are a badge of fraud. What but fraud was in the mind of these gentlemen when they added the words "so help us over the fence" to that oath? [Laughter.] Will some gentleman explain it on any other theory? It can not be explained. It never will be explained. It stands as a mark of villainy on that paper for all time to come. But we respected as mean a paper as that, trying to support the view of the contestee in the case and trying to keep in harmony with the distinguished gentleman from Georgia and his associates who filed the minority report in the case. Still, the majority of the committee did not give to that particular fact the force to which I believe it to be entitled. Besides, there were other infirmities in that precinct, if you will allow me.

But that is not all. Why, Mr. Speaker, if I were to wade through this case in all of its filth, I would want a pair of rubber boots to come up to my shoulders. [Laughter.] Let us see what such an authority as Paine, in reference to elections, says—I read section 499:

Honest voters may lose their votes through the criminal misconduct of dishonest officers of election. While it is well settled that the mere neglect to comply with directory requirements of law, or the performance of duty in a mistaken manner, without bad faith or injurious results, will not justify the rejection of the entire poll, it is equally well settled that when the proceedings are so tarnished with fraudulent, negligent, or improper conduct on the part of the officers that the result of the election is rendered unreliable, the entire returns will be rejected, and the parties left to make such proof as they may of the votes legally cast for them.

That is the A B C of the election law, recognized by every intelligent man who has ever investigated an election case, and yet in every one of the 10 precincts in question—yes, all of the Dallas precincts that were assailed for irregularities of a gross character, such as voting dead negroes and dead white men, voting a hundred or a thousand where only 40, 20, or 30 had voted or gone to the polls, or something of that character—the contestee stood there like an ass in a hailstorm and never opened his mouth [laughter and applause]—never offered any evidence to protect even the election officers from these charges of fraud.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, these people of Alabama who had stood up there through storm after storm, honestly believing that corrupt hands had been placed upon the ballot box, the men who in many instances have been ostracised because of their political opinion, the men who, if any people in this country, are to be looked upon as heroes, possessing the grit of which martyrs are made—I say that when these men rose up finally in their might and hurled thunderbolt after thunderbolt against these people, sledge-hammer blow after sledge-hammer blow against them, they stood there in perfect silence and never opened their mouths, but they come before this House relying upon technical objections such as no lawyer that had had a license for two days ought to think of insisting upon. [Laughter.]

Why, my friend has raised the point in his report, and it is the first objection made, that the notice of contest was defective, that it was not stated with sufficient accuracy, with sufficient technical certainty. They wanted more certainty than is required in the pleadings in any court. They wanted more certainty than has ever been known in any tribunal that I ever heard of. They say the notice will not do, when it is a straight-out allegation of rascality and fraud at that election, and when it gives notice of what they were going to do. The second technical objection is that the notary public before whom the testimony was taken had no authority. Why, it must be clear, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] put it, that when the Federal Government, when the Congress of the United States, having charge of these Federal elections, confers upon any person, no matter who, the right to take depositions, that he exercises that right, not by virtue of a State law, but by virtue of the power given him by the Federal statute.

Suppose, as my friend suggested, the statute had said that any justice of the peace should have this power. Does anybody deny it? Suppose it had said any minister of the gospel should have this power. Does anybody deny it? In my State it is the law, and I believe I can safely say it is the law in the State in question here that in taking depositions all you have to do is to put in your notice the name of the party before whom the deposition is to be taken, and it does not matter who he is; if your State statute authorizes it, he is properly authorized to take the depositions. So here the Federal jurisdiction over Federal officers is absolute and complete; and when they designate the person before whom the deposition is to be taken, or the agency before whom the deposition is to be taken, I do not care what it is, that agency exercises the power conferred, not by reason of the existence of the State statute, but by reason of the Federal statute creating the agency and designating it. And yet my friend ridicules the idea and says it will not stand the test of reason, as I understand it, or the application to it of numerous decisions; but I believe I am safe in saying that not one of the cases cited by the gentleman was a case where the Federal Government had exercised its power or conferred any such authority.

Now, gentlemen, a good deal has been said here about the testimony. I have not time to run over it all, but there are some things which I want to bring out. There are some things about this matter that a man will not believe unless he is forced to do it. There is hardly a man in this House who would have believed, if it had not been sworn to, that any such oath as that was ever administered in any Christian country in holding an election, and yet it is here.

Let me call your attention to another thing. It has been alleged that dead negroes voted in this election. Well, gentlemen, that is hard for us to believe. When President Harrison propounded that interrogatory to the Congress of the United States, and when Henry Watterson promulgated the patriotic sentiment that he did at Chicago, when he was addressing foreign representatives of the world, many good men thought at that time that that was an unnecessary sounding of the note of alarm.

We should have heard it just as we hear this, as we hear the ringing of the fire bell at night. I refer to this placing in the ballot box of three thousand and more fraudulent votes, and in addition to that, in many instances, hyena-like, robbing the grave, making the tombs perform the dastardly office of an appearance at the polls, to be counted as one Democratic vote. [Laughter.] I will not try to read all this testimony, for it would take me too long, but I will read some of it. I do not want to disturb the slumbers of anybody, but if my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] can sleep well to-night after that, he is proof against all sorts of devilment in this world. [Laughter.] Let me turn to page 17. I want to show you just a little of this. Here is a witness by the name of Mat Givhan. Listen to his testimony:

Q. Do you know Allen Du Bose?
A. I used to know him. He used to live in Summerfield precinct. He is dead.
Q. How long has he been dead?
A. About eighteen months.
Q. Is there any other man living in that precinct by the name of Allen Du Bose?
A. No, sir; not that I know of.
Q. Is there any other man living there by the name of Silas Molett?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Are Silas Molett and Allen Du Bose both colored men?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Bill Martin?
A. Yes, sir; I know one Bill Martin.
Q. Does he live in Summerfield?
A. No, sir; he used to live in Summerfield.
Q. Was Bill Martin a colored man?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How long since he left there?
A. One year ago.
Q. Is there any other Bill Martin living in that precinct, or living there on the 6th day of November last?
A. No, sir.

But the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] answers that by saying there was a man named Dollar Bill in his town once. What has that got to do with the matter?

Q. Do you know Frank Norwood?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is he a white or colored man?
A. He is a colored man.
Q. Does he live in Summerfield precinct?
A. He used to live there. He lives in Birmingham now.
Q. How long has he been in Birmingham?
A. He has been there one year, sir.
Q. What does he do there, do you know?
A. He waits on Dr. Jackson.
Q. Is there a colored man or white man by the name of Frank Norwood now living in Summerfield precinct, or was living there on the 6th day of November, 1894?
A. No, sir; not that I know of.
Q. Do you know William W. Callen?
A. Yes, sir; I used to know him. He is dead.
Q. How long has he been dead?
A. Seben or eight months.

They put it down "seben," just as the poor negro stated it.

Q. Was he a colored man?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. He died before the last November election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know any other man by the name of William W. Callen living in your precinct now or at the time of the last November election?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Do you know Robert Boyd?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Does he live in Summerfield precinct?
A. No, sir; he used to live there.
Q. Is he a colored or white man?
A. Colored man.
Q. Was he living there on the 6th day of last November?
A. No, sir.

Now, take page 65. Indulge me; this is right interesting reading to me; I do not know how it is to you. [Great laughter.]

Q. Does J. H. Burns live in River beat?
A. No, sir; I do not know of any such man.
Q. Does Joe Green live there?
A. He used to live there, but he is dead.

[Laughter.]

Q. Was he a colored man?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How long has he been dead?
A. About seven years.

[Laughter.]

That is the young man; and his father, who is also named Joe Green, has been dead about ten years. They were both colored men.

That is the case of "Dollar Bill"; but he got both Greens in this case. So he could not lose by it.

Q. Do you know Prince Hatcher?
A. Yes, sir; he is a colored man and lives about 1 mile from me.
Q. Did he vote on the 6th day of November last?
A. I do not know positively, but I heard him say he did not register, and that he did not intend to vote.
Q. Do you know Robert Huckabee?
A. I did know him.
Q. What has become of him?
A. He is dead.

[Laughter.]

Q. How long has he been dead?
A. I think he died about the 1st of last September.
Q. Do you know Starke Hunter?
A. I used to know him.
Q. How long ago?
A. It has been about twelve years ago, I think.
Q. Has he moved out of the country.
A. He was moved to the cemetery?

[Great laughter.]

Q. How long is it since he took up his abode in that place?
A. I think it has been about twelve years.

[Laughter.]

Well, now, he must have been a faithful Democrat, because he stuck to the party not only as long as he lived, but voted for the party twelve years after he died. [Great laughter.] I take it that he is not a Jeffersonian Democrat, but an "Organized Democrat." [Renewed laughter.]

Q. Do you know Silas Jackson?
A. I did know him once.
Q. Well, what is the matter with him?
A. He was moved to the cemetery four years ago.

[Laughter.]

Q. Do you know a man living in River precinct by the name of Rufus Riggs?
A. I used to know a man living there by that name, but he is dead.

[Laughter.]

He was a colored man and died last year, in January, I think, in the early part of the year.
Q. Do you know James Wilkins, in that precinct?
A. Yes, sir; there used to live a man there by that name.
Q. What became of him?
A. The last time that I saw him he was swinging to a limb of a tree.

[Great laughter.]

He was lynched. That was some time in 1893.

Yet we find him set down as an "Organized Democrat" at the last election [laughter], and I have no doubt he voted for my good friend over there, Major Robbins. Now, I do not intend to say anything against Mr. Robbins, because I do not make war on men, but I war on vicious methods. It is the duty of Congress to war upon vicious methods such as this and to wither the hand that pulls down the ballot box, to wither it with death just as God, in his wrath, withered the hand that touched the Ark of the Covenant without authority. [Applause.]

Q. Did you look over that poll list to-night and examine it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. That is a certified poll list from River precinct, is it not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State whether or not you noticed a great many names on there of colored men whom you know did not vote at River precinct on the 6th day of November, 1894.
A. I did; many others besides those I have mentioned.

Well, good gracious, you see how I have spotted the book in trying to pick out those that are dead, and there are a great many others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, according to Mr. Paine, according to common reason, and according to the dictates of every enlightened conscience in this body, when the returns are so tainted with irregularities or with crimes that it is impossible to separate the good from the vicious, what else is there left to do except, in the language of Mr. Paine, to disregard the election returns altogether. They have been assailed successfully. Their integrity has been assailed. They have presented no evidence in this case to overturn this, and then what is left? Why, nothing at all is left except that you shall count the voters shown to have voted, and how they voted, by competent evidence. But here in this case, Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence, only these election frauds. It is shown that it was done in the way I have suggested, rendering, in my opinion, utterly invalid the returns, assailing the integrity of the returns, and destroying their force. Then, the contestee in this case remained perfectly silent, and offered no evidence, but relied on the presumption that might arise, to wit, that these returns make out a prima facie case, and that he would ask the House, on the election returns, to determine this case, and not to touch this work which they suppose they had made perfect. I submit that, with all the evidence of fraud, it is impossible for this House to respect these returns and determine this case safely upon them.

Now, let me call attention to another circumstance tending to show fraud at these beats in Dallas County, for, mark you, that is the only place where the election is assailed. In all the other counties, white counties, strange to say, the Republicans carried the election by some 1,652 votes. Those 5 white counties, possessing a population of 111,000, gave Mr. Aldrich a majority of 1,662, but when you come to the negro county, where there are only 40,000 people altogether, and only 2,500 white men, you find that that county gives Robbins more votes than he got in all the other 5 counties. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended.

Mr. DANIELS. We shall have no objection to having the gentleman's time extended, Mr. Speaker, provided the extension does not trench upon the time assigned to other gentlemen.

By unanimous consent, the time on each side was extended thirty minutes.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, another circumstance that I want to call attention to is this, but first I will read a brief extract from a North Carolina decision. I love to read North Carolina decisions, because every man has an idea, of course, that the State from which he comes possesses peculiar merit, especially in the legal department, and I think I can claim that for North Carolina, because it is the State of Settle and Pearson—Pearson, C. J., being to North Carolina what Jere Black was to the State in which he lived, the grandest State in the Union in many respects, especially in the department of legal learning. I read now from this decision in the case of Boyer vs. Teague. (106 N. C. Reports.)

Where it does not appear from direct testimony for what candidate a voter voted, circumstantial evidence tending to establish the fact is admissible. The fact that a certain person engaged in handing out tickets for a certain candidate, and for no other person, and that he gave tickets to one W. and "voted him," is admissible in evidence and tends to show for whom W. voted.

It is unnecessary for me to read further. I refer to this decision only to show that in contested election cases circumstantial evidence is as much in order and has as much force and effect as in any other kind of case.

Now, bearing that decision in mind, I want to direct your attention to a circumstance arising out of these reports and out of the evidence in this case, which tends, in my opinion, to strengthen the contention of the majority report. Take the other townships in the county where the Republicans had representatives—for, mark you, it is a peculiar device of men who want to steal votes in the South, and in the North, too, I take it, either to give the party that they want to cheat no representation, or to take care that the representation they have shall be so infirm and of such insufficient intelligence as to be unable to perform the duties of the occasion. Take these townships that are not contested—I will ask the gentleman from New York how many of them there are?

Mr. DANIELS. There are 28 in all.

Mr. DINSMORE. And 13 not contested.

Mr. LINNEY. Take those 13 townships not contested in Dallas County; they give the Democratic candidate 221 votes, about 16 votes to a precinct. Why so? Why, because the Republican leaders requested the Republicans not to go to the polls. Now, why did they tell them not to go to the polls? What was the reason? I have been a candidate for office several times in my life, but, before God, I declare if there was anything that I always desired more than another, except the salvation of my own soul, it was that every man who was willing to vote for me should go to the polls. [Laughter.] That, I think, has been the feeling of every man who has been a candidate; but here, for one time in the history of the world—only one time, I believe—the representative of the Republican party in that district, or at all events a man who had a right to be a candidate, Mr. Aldrich, went around to his supporters and said to them, "Don't go to the polls." Why did he do that? What motive inspired him? There must have been a motive. Men do not act without a motive. You find men who do act without a motive in the insane asylum or ready to go there. [Laughter.]

Whenever there is intelligent action there is a motive behind that intelligent action. These men viewed the entire situation and they decided upon this course. They alleged, and they still allege, that for years this county, with a Republican majority of five or six thousand, had been fraudulently made to return a Democratic majority of four or five thousand. That was their contention, and in order to establish it they told their supporters to keep away from the polls. That command was obeyed with a unanimity scarcely seen in the history of political contests elsewhere. The result was that where the Republicans had proper representatives, in these townships not contested, the vote only averaged about 16 to the precinct, because there were not many Democrats in those townships and the Republicans stayed away; but when you come to these 10 beats that gave the fraudulent vote, what did they do? It is alleged by the contestant that they gave his party no representatives at all at those beats.

Here is Mr. Wallace's testimony, in which he swears that he furnished a list, but they were not appointed. Running over this list appointed, I find a number of men who can not read—men who have made their mark. Now, what is the difference between an inspector of elections who can not read and a calf? I believe I would rather risk an election upon the calf than upon such a man. What would you think of appointing a blind and deaf man to such a position? Why, sir, an inspector of elections who can not read is as blind as a stump and as deaf as a stone so far as the matters in hands are concerned. That is the character of the men who were appointed in response to the just and honorable demands of the contestant in this case. He asked for justice. He made a patriotic appeal to the law and under the law to the heart, the brain, the conscience of those officers, who were bound to observe the law, but when he asked for bread they gave him a stone; when he asked for fish, they thrust upon him a slimy serpent. They gave him as inspectors these men who could not read and write. Some of these men swear that there were not as many votes given as the polls show. When asked, "Did you not sign the poll list?" one of these men would reply, "Yes; I made my mark to something; I don't know what." Do you not think, gentlemen, that a calf could have done just as well as a man like that? The only difference is that the calf has four legs and the man two; one stands in the image of a brute, and the other in the image of his God.

Wherever there was a fair showing, the result was according to the claim of the contestant in this case; but wherever agencies of the sort described were resorted to, the result was what? An abnormal swelling of the votes—5,000 votes cast in those 10 or 11 contested beats, and 221 in the other noncontested beats where the contestee had a fair showing.

Something has been said about the negro always voting for the man who favors him. In this matter gentlemen on the other side blow both hot and cold. They say that Aldrich is a millionaire. I do not know that anybody has sworn to this; but it may be that he is, for I take it that gentlemen who have made this remark would not do so without knowing something about the facts. But suppose he is a man of wealth. Why, sir, what is to become of the boasted intelligence of the Democratic party? The truth is, gentlemen, that for years the Republicans in the South were under the ban of social ostracism; it was a hard matter to be a Republican in the South; but now, thank God, the weight of social position and excellence is on our side. [Laughter.]

So, sir, this idea that the Democracy of Alabama has been subdued, has been overreached, is something like the pretense that a mouse has overreached a lion. The thing exists only in the excited imagination of the friends of the contestee. No, I will not say the friends of the contestee; for I observe a remarkable conservatism on the part of the gentlemen on the other side in many cases of this kind. Sir, I have seen political fights in North Carolina where the political lines were closely drawn. In one case two days after an election a suit was brought upon a matter growing out entirely of the heat of the election contest. The jury was composed of six Democrats and six Republicans; they were out four days and each man voted according to the political faith that was in him; at the end of four days they stood six for the plaintiff and six for the defendant. That illustrates what has been the general character of contested-election cases.

But more recently in cases of this kind in this House, be it said to the glory of this House and the members connected with it, I have seen a more conservative disposition—a disposition to examine questions of this kind as any other judicial question would be examined. For instance, my friends over there admit—a thing the like of which has never been done before—that the vote in 10 beats of this district was fraudulent; and they admit that a great many of these votes ought to be thrown out. The vice of their argument is that after making this admission they assume that where a number of votes were given without any information as to whom they were cast for, these votes must be counted for their side. That reasoning will not do. If the returns show that a thousand votes were cast, but do not show for whom they were cast, and there is fraud enough to destroy the returns, then the whole thing is at an end. So says Mr. Paine in his work on elections, and so say all the authorities.

In accordance with these authorities the committee thought that in a case of this kind the real state of the vote, so far as possible, must be ascertained by such parol evidence as might be accessible. Of course they need not go so far as to hunt one grain of wheat in a stack of straw (using the illustration of a great author); but when the mass of the vote has been fraudulently returned, parol evidence as to the way particular votes were cast may be admitted. The theory on which the majority of the committee acted was that wherever in these returns it appeared that there had been fraudulent practices, such as the voting of dead men or the voting of many hundreds of ballots when only 34 or 35 persons attended at the polls and voted, we should throw aside the returns and only take account of such votes as were shown by the evidence in chief or brought out on cross-examination—there being none for the contestee—to have been actually cast, with the information for whom those votes were cast.

I maintain that it is a sound legal principle. It can not be controverted, and never has been successfully denied. There is no argument worth a cent against it. Then, if it be a sound legal proposition, our conclusion was on that basis, that applying the principle of law to the fact here, where a return was made of, say, 2,000 votes, and the evidence shows no more than 200 or 500, we set aside that return and then examine the testimony to determine how many voted, for whom they voted, and how they should be counted, and if we found 5 votes or 100 votes and could not find for whom they voted, then we set them aside, and if we found any number voting and for whom they voted we put it down as a proper vote to be received and counted. That is a regular legal proposition on which, at any rate, I, as a member of the committee, acted; it is a sound proposition, and can not be assailed by any painstaking lawyer. It is on that principle exclusively that I made up my count, and I have accepted it as a correct one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will take up but very little more time of the House. I am grateful for the attention given me.

It has probably never happened before in the history of this country that such glaring frauds have been perpetrated as were perpetrated at this election, and it is a high compliment to the farseeing statesmanship of Harrison and Henry Watterson that they should have sounded the alarm several years ago on this matter.

What is our duty as the representatives of the great American people on this floor? It is to stand up for the purity of the ballot box. [Applause.] It is our duty to do all that we can to suppress these peculiar forms of corruption, and the prostitution of the ballot, which Henry Watterson said had reached the high-water mark years ago. We must do it. We have promised to do it; we have proposed to do it. Let us keep our word. We can not now listen to the appeals of sympathy that come to us in behalf of a contestee upon this floor. We have a higher duty to perform, and one that we can not disregard. If we do, we put ourselves in the same shape that was represented by Lord Macaulay in one of his treatises some years ago where he spoke of one party in England representing truth and patriotism and another party representing fraud. In the course of time they changed faith and stood one of them in the form of a god, speaking like a man, and another like a serpent, and that in the course of time the tail of the serpent split in two and made two legs, while the legs of the man twisted around and made a tail; that arms rose from the body of the serpent, making the arms of a man, and the head of the man sent forth the hissing tones of the serpent. At length the man glided away a hissing viper, while the serpent stood up the stalwart representative of fraud, having taken on the garb of a god.

We can not place ourselves in that position. We must do our duty to our fellow-citizens and to the country, and stamp out, under the inspiring words of Harrison and Watterson, the villainy that has been perpetrated. We must wither the hands of the 2,000, 3,000, aye, near 5,000 men who in this election put their impious hands on the Ark of the Covenant. We must destroy them forever. We must sustain the foundation on which the Republic rests, and generations to come will rise up and call us blessed. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I yield now one hour to my colleague from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE].

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I see that the hour is growing late, and I very much dislike to be compelled to break my speech in two, and shall therefore, if the members of the House will be somewhat patient, endeavor to close what I have to say on this case this afternoon.

Allow me to say at the very beginning that this case can not be settled by crimination or recrimination. After it is all through with and the discussion ended, we must settle which one of these two men was elected to the seat in this House. It seems to me that this case can be compressed into a very small compass, after all.

While it is stated in the report of the minority that there are two legal questions presented for your consideration, but one of them has been discussed. You will observe by their report that they say the notice of contest is not sufficient, although in the debate which has followed not a word has been said on that part of the subject, and therefore I pass it.

The next question raised is simply one of law, a principle with which you are all no doubt familiar, and it is not necessary that I should dwell upon it at any great length.

It is a question whether or not a notary public residing in one county is authorized to take depositions outside of the borders of that county. It has already been stated here that the authority which the notary has is given him solely and exclusively by the United States statute. He does not derive it from any State law. It comes to him by virtue of the fact that the statutes of the United States clothe him with the authority to take this testimony. The statute provides that the contestant may apply to any one of the officers designated in that statute. Among these is the notary public; and all the statute requires is that that officer shall reside within the Congressional district. It further provides that if none of these officers designated are found to reside within the Congressional district, the contestant may apply then to two justices of the peace. Now, suppose it should happen that there was no notary public living in any of the counties but one, and that the contestant was going into the other counties for the purpose of taking his deposition, in which counties no notary public resided. Before whom would he take that deposition? Why, you might say before a justice of the peace. But you can not say that, for the statute says that if there is a notary public residing anywhere in the Congressional district the testimony must be taken before him before you can resort to the two justices of the peace. Hence it is perfectly evident that what the statute means is simply that the notary public should be one residing somewhere in the Congressional district.

But we pass that now, and I leave it to be discussed by my friend the chairman of the committee [Mr. DANIELS] when he closes this debate.

The important inquiry here after all is whether the contestant has received a majority of the votes in this Congressional district. It has already been shown to you that in five of these counties he received a majority of over 1,600. He comes down to Dallas County with over 1,600 majority, and the proof in the record shows that Dallas County is the strongest Republican county in the whole Congressional district. It appears in the evidence that Dallas County at one time before this machinery got into operation gave the Republican ticket usually from five to six thousand majority; but as soon as this machinery was in operation that majority was swept aside, and one witness, who appears to be an exceedingly reputable citizen of Dallas County, who is president of the senate and a Democrat, by the way, says that after that time the Democrats usually rolled up a majority in that county of from four to nine thousand. There are only about 10,000 votes in the entire county. It is admitted upon all hands that there are not more than 2,200 or 2,400 white men living within the borders of that county; that the balance of the voters are negroes, every one of whom is a stalwart Republican and is as true to his faith as the compass is to the north star.

Now, when we come into Dallas County, and the returns are made up, this 1,600 majority that the contestant has is swept entirely away, and in its place is substituted a majority of 3,700 for the Democratic candidate. And that is not all of it. This great majority is piled up in about one-half of that county. It already appears that there are 28 precincts in that county of Dallas. The notice of contest attacks each one of those precincts; but when the contestant took his evidence, it only applied to 15 of them. As to these 15 precincts, four of the majority of the committee have concluded to count 2, and two of the majority have concluded to count only 1 as it was returned.

Now, in the 13 precincts upon which there was no evidence offered Mr. Robbins received only 221 votes; and yet when the returns come in from the county, he has in that county of Dallas 5,460 votes. All but 221 of them are received in 15 precincts of that county! That is the situation of things. And it furthermore appears in evidence here—and that is a significant fact and one that ought to be borne in mind—these frauds upon the ballot box had continued so long and to such an extent that the Republicans had utterly despaired of having their votes counted in that county as they were cast.

When they went to the polls and voted their votes were counted for the Democratic ticket in each instance, and of this the evidence and the record are full. There is not a single whisper anywhere in that evidence which denies it.

In the campaign of 1894 an instruction was issued to the Republican voters of that county to stay away from the polls; to refrain from voting; for if they did vote their votes would be counted for the other man. Now, I ask you, what condition of things is that; and how does it reflect upon the men who have had control of the election machinery of that county to say that elections have been conducted in such a manner that over four-fifths of the county dare not go to the ballot box and cast their votes? And yet we are appealed to upon this floor not to disfranchise some honest voter down there in Dallas County; to be extremely cautious lest we unseat the man who now holds that place in this House.

It seems that this sort of instruction coming to the negro voters of that county was not very acceptable to our Democratic friends, or at least to those that were managing the election. This man Compton, of whom I have spoken, who is president of the senate of Alabama, makes a statement here which reveals just the tendency of these men and what they were anxious to do. Some question was put to this man while he was upon the witness stand, asking him if he had heard of the fact that the Republicans were instructed to stay away from the election, and he said he had heard of it, but he did not believe they did stay away, but that they did register. Here is what he says:

I have seen such a circular—

Meaning a circular instructing the Republicans to stay away from the election.

A. I have seen such a circular as is asked about purporting to have been issued by the Republican leaders, advising the negroes to refrain from registering for the August election of 1894. I have heard the effect of that circular discussed among Democrats in Selma, and as to whether the negroes would refrain from registering.

Why were they debating the effect of that circular anyhow?

While the registration was in progress I made inquiry of several well-known Democrats in the country precincts of this county as to whether the negroes were obeying the orders of that circular—

He was anxious to know something about it—and I was informed in answer to my questions on that subject that the negroes were registering in the country precincts largely.

Q. Did you not state a moment ago that in hearing that matter discussed here in Selma the consensus of opinion was that the negroes were not registering as well as the Democrats would like?

A. I said that the Democrats had expressed themselves as having some fears that the negroes would refrain from registering, consequently I made inquiries of registrars as to that fact.

This shows that there was an anxiety upon their part for fear the negroes would not register and would not go to the polling place on election day, because the opportunity for counting their votes would be swept away from them. But when election day came, some of the negroes did register and some of them did vote. But whether they registered or voted or not, notwithstanding all that, their votes were counted just the same, and in each instance were counted for the Democratic candidate, as had been done on former occasions. Now, then, we may simply go to these precincts which are in dispute; and remember one thing—that in these 13 precincts upon which no evidence has been brought and upon which there is no controversy, where it seems there was an honest vote and an honest counting, Aldrich received, the contestant received, 42 votes, 16 per cent of the votes cast in these 13 precincts. If the same proportion should have voted throughout the entire county, according to the vote as returned by these election officers, Aldrich would have had a vote of 363 in the county of Dallas; but when the returns came in he had a vote of 72 as counted by these election officers, and only 72.

Now, then, I have stated to you that of these 15 precincts part of us have agreed to count 2 of them, but the rest of us have agreed to count but 1. The minority agree with us as to all of these with the exception of 2 others. They insist on counting Orville beat and Oldtown beat.

Mr. DINSMORE. And Woodlawn.

Mr. ROYSE. Excuse me. Woodlawn, Orville, and Oldtown, which is 3. It will only take me a moment to go through these precincts. Now, they propose to count Woodlawn. Yet it is in evidence here by two witnesses, uncontradicted except by one, that they went to the polling place in the morning, before the polls were opened; they stayed there until the polls were closed; counted every single man that went into the polling place, including the election officers, and they only amounted to 14 men all told. There are two witnesses, uncontradicted except by one, and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] this morning gave you something of the character of that man, Mr. St. John Tavell, and he read to you his own statement. When the question was put to him if he would swear as to how many votes were polled that day in that precinct, he says:

I will not swear, for I recognize I am under oath now.

What was he doing? Was he not under oath when he made that return? Why, I suspect that he was not under oath, for he says when that question is put to him:

Q. Were you sworn on the day of the election?

A. I do not know whether I was or not. I can not remember whether I was or not.

Perhaps there was administered to that man just the same sort of an oath as was administered to the man in the Pences beat, which was read by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], that he did not regard it as an oath, and that he did not regard that he was making this return under oath; but when he came to be sworn before that officer, and lifted up his hand before high Heaven and took an oath that he was to tell the truth and the whole truth, and knew that perjury was staring him in the face, that man said:

I recognize now that I am under oath.

He does not stop there, but he says that he never signed his name in the same way that it is signed to these returns in all his life. When pressed upon, and the question is asked if he did sign the returns, he said he did not know certainly, but thinks he did, but if he did he never signed it in that way in all his life. Now, that is the kind of witness that they want to contradict these other two witnesses with. I want to put the question right squarely to you. Do you want to take the word of that man as against the other two? Certainly not.

Now we will come down to Orville precinct. Our friends insist on counting the Orville precinct. There was one witness that went there in the morning for the purpose of watching the polls. He counted the number of voters that went into the polling place. He stayed there until 11 o'clock, and then the election officers came out of their room in the voting place and drove that man away with threats of bodily harm; and they drove him away, too, because of the fact that he was watching there, and they told him that they did not want him there watching their proceedings at that election place.

That is one witness. Another witness testifies that he is well acquainted with the voters of that precinct. He takes the poll list, looks it over, and picks out the names of 26 men on that list and says that neither one of them is a legal voter in that precinct. But the case does not rest there. There are 5 men whose names are upon that poll list of whom it is said that neither one of them voted, and it turns out that each one of those men has his registration certificate, and those certificates are put in evidence in this record. The law of Alabama requires that before any man can receive a ticket to be voted he must deliver up his registration certificate, so that the fact that a man still has his registration certificate is evidence that he has not voted. Now, these 5 men still have their registration certificates, which appear in this record, showing clearly that they never voted; and yet we are told that this precinct ought to be counted as returned. Observe those 5 men were counted as having voted in that precinct. It seems quite clear that that precinct must go.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I suggest to the gentleman that what he has just been saying applies to Woodlawn and not to Orville.

Mr. ROYSE. Yes; it applies to Woodlawn.

Mr. COX. These 5 men who still had their certificates; for whom were their votes counted?

Mr. ROYSE. I do not know. I can not tell. It is utterly impossible to tell how any man voted there except so far as the testimony discloses it in a few instances. In three or four instances, perhaps, in each precinct the record discloses that certain men voted for Robbins, and in other instances it shows that certain men voted for Aldrich. Whenever the fact appears in evidence, the votes are counted just as they are shown to have been cast.

Mr. PAYNE. How many were counted for Aldrich in the whole county?

Mr. ROYSE. Seventy-two votes only. Now, the next precinct that I want to discuss is Oldtown. Our friends think that ought to be counted. In that precinct Mr. Jones, who, by the way, voted for Robbins, went to the place of holding the election early in the morning, about 9 o'clock. He stays around there about an hour and then he votes; then he stays around two or three hours longer, some of the time not very close to the poll, sometimes 150 yards away, but always in plain sight of it. He leaves there about 2 o'clock in the afternoon; and up to that time only 8 men had come to the voting place and voted.

That is his testimony. Then there are 18 persons whose names appear on the poll list as having voted who swear that they neither registered nor voted at that election. I know it is true, as suggested by my friend from Georgia, that that testimony is not necessarily conclusive; that because a certain man's name is on the poll list and he swears he did not register the evidence of fraud is not conclusive, because there may possibly be somebody else bearing the same name in the county. I admit that, but the law in reference to identity of persons is well settled. Identity of name is prima facie evidence of identity of person. In all civil cases where the question arises the identity of name makes a prima facie case of identity of person. But in this case the witnesses have sworn themselves to be men that have lived in the neighborhood for years, and each one of them swears that he is well acquainted throughout the whole precinct and that there is not another man within the limits of the precinct bearing the same name. Moreover, it was possible for our friends upon the other side to have shown these statements to be false, for every single voter is registered and they could have produced the registration list and shown that these men were in fact registered who swore that they were not registered. But not a single registration list appears in evidence in this case. The evidence discloses that application was made for this list; it shows that the notary public who took the deposition sent a written notice to the judge of probate demanding the list, but that it was not given to him.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did the contestant demand the registration list?

Mr. ROYSE. Yes, sir; he demanded it by letter and offered to pay for it, but he did not get it. I was about to refer to the testimony of one man here who swears that he did not vote. In Alabama they have an election in August. The State election is held then. One of these men who testifies that he did not vote at all in the November election was examined. From his testimony it appears that he was an inspector of election at the August election. He was appointed an inspector and he went and held that position. Some questions were asked him in reference to what he did at the August election. I read from his examination:

Q. You say that you were one of the inspectors out there in the last August election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Mr. H. A. Hardy and Mr. Ed. Dudley were the other two?
A. Yes, sir; and Mr. Browning was also in there.
Q. Did you sign the returns—make a mark to it?
A. Yes, sir; made a cross.
Q. Did you count the votes out before you signed those returns?
A. No, sir; they did not count them at all.
Q. What did you make that cross for?
A. I made it because they told me to make it.
Q. Who told you to make it?
A. Mr. Hendrix Hardy.
Q. How many people voted there that day?
A. To my judgment there were not more than 45 or 50—

That was at the August election. Yet our friends on the other side want to count at that precinct 278 votes at the November election—

Three of them were colored voters and the others were white.
Q. You are a colored man, are you not? Did you vote there in August?
A. I am a colored man, and voted there in August.
Q. You had not registered, had you?
A. No, sir.
Q. How came you to vote?
A. Mr. Minter told me that I had registered.

That was the manner of conducting elections down there in the State of Alabama and right there in the precinct that our friends want to keep in this count.

Now, gentlemen, there is but one other precinct to which I need refer—the precinct of Selma. Upon the face of the returns there is abundant evidence of fraud at that precinct. The city of Selma, as has been stated this morning, had a population of about 7,500, according to the census of 1890. Calculating on that basis, it could not have had a greater population than about 8,000 at the November election in 1894; and with that population there would be only about 1,600 votes in the city of Selma. Yet 2,021 votes were returned as having been cast in that one precinct—more than 4 votes to the minute. Does any man believe it? Why, sir, it is laid down as one of the principles by which we are to be guided in investigations of cases like this that wherever the election officers who have the authority to divide up precincts crowd too many voters into one precinct, it is upon the face of it evidence of fraud.

And it is utterly impossible to have an honest election in that city of Selma. Formerly, as appears in the evidence, that city was divided into a number of precincts. Those precincts have been abolished, and that city now is all included in one precinct, with 1,600 to 1,800 votes in the precinct. There is no process known to the law by which each honest voter can cast his ballot on election day in that one precinct.

But it is not necessary that I should go through all this precinct, for the evidence of fraud is so strong that the committee are unanimous in discarding the returns in this precinct. The only question with us was as to the number of votes that we should count. Four of us have concluded that we could count no votes except what the witnesses had sworn to—3 for Mr. Robbins and 5 for Mr. Aldrich. Our friends of the minority insist on counting 767 votes for Mr. Robbins. Yet they say they can not tell how many votes were cast in that precinct, and it is utterly impossible to tell for whom they were cast. It is true that if it should appear that nobody but Robbins men went to the polls on election day we could count a certain number of votes for him, for we could discard the fraudulent votes and accept the balance as the vote for Mr. Robbins. But it must be remembered that 16 per cent of the vote cast in the precincts where there is no dispute were for Mr. Aldrich. If we assume the same proportion of votes for Mr. Aldrich in this precinct, he would receive somewhere between 100 and 200 votes. Yet the minority of the committee propose to deprive him of every single vote. They do not propose to allow him in this precinct the 16 per cent which he has in the other precincts where there is no contest—where the election was honest.

It is further impossible to count the vote here, because these instructions did not apply to a number of white voters. The evidence is conclusive that a number of white voters had joined the Populist party; some others of the white voters had united themselves with another faction known as the Jeffersonian Democrats. These instructions did not apply to those men. They registered, and went to the polls and voted on election day. How many of them voted no one can tell, for the returns can not be relied upon, and no witnesses have sworn that so many men voted for Robbins, so many for Aldrich, and that so many votes were blank. There was no basis in the world upon which we could count these votes except by a sort of guesswork.

But one of these men who stood at the court-house and saw the men enter there on that day says that perhaps there were 50 negroes among the number that he saw. Another man says that he counted 11 negroes who went in there on that day. And the evidence shows that the negroes vote the Republican ticket. One man who looked over that poll list said he could pick out on the list 50 names of negro voters, and all of them Republicans. In that state of the evidence I ask you how any man can count a single vote in that precinct. The only course for us is to cast the vote aside. It is an unsafe principle to guess at votes.

Of course it is of the greatest importance that every man's vote, honestly cast, should, if possible, be counted; that no man should be disfranchised; yet one of the best methods of preserving the purity of ballot and protecting voters from being disfranchised is to have some well-settled, sensible rule by which the votes shall be counted.

Suppose you undertake to guess this vote. How do you know but that you are disfranchising the 50 negro voters who voted that day? Perhaps they voted for the Republican candidate, and then you guess 50 Democratic voters, thus neutralizing their votes. Is it a safe rule to go by? Should you be so anxious to count votes if the result of your count would disfranchise honest voters? The only safe rule is to refuse to count any votes where the returns are unreliable. Compel the men asking for the votes to make satisfactory proof, proof that is reliable, as to what votes were cast and by whom they were cast. The law is carefully guarded in its provisions in reference to the counting of votes, and it is our duty to be equally careful in the consideration of these questions which arise in this body, because if we adopt the suggestions that have been made here it may result in the disfranchisement of honest voters. We have no right to do that. The important thing is to determine the matter right, and not go astray. We should not be so anxious, therefore, to count votes, or stand in fear and trembling because our action may result in the disfranchising of men who voted for Mr. Robbins. How many men have been disfranchised there who voted the Republican ticket during the last generation? And these election frauds, Mr. Speaker, have been carried on there for twenty years—unblushingly carried on. That being the case, these are the last men in the world to ask that we be somewhat cautious in the determination of this question.

Now, my friends, to make a comparison here between the votes of this district at the present time and on a former occasion, and I will conclude. There was a contest over a seat for Congress in 1882 in this same district. Dallas County was a part of the district at that time, and in the report of the committee on that contested election we have a table of the votes of Dallas County by precincts, or at least a large number of the precincts, and I have made a comparison between the votes cast then and the votes in this last election. There is no dispute but what that vote was an honest one. The returning board threw out the votes of those precincts that were strongly Republican. They were thrown out on a mere technicality, on the ground that the returns were not formal; but there was no question but that the votes were honest.

Let us see now the result of the comparison. Somerville precinct in 1894 is returned with a Democratic vote of 160 and a Republican vote of 2. What was it in 1882, when there was no dispute that the vote was honest? Nothing for the Democrats and 250 for the Republicans. Martins precinct in 1894, 502 Democratic votes and no Republican votes; in 1882 it was 1 Democratic vote and 304 Republican votes. Orville precinct, the one they want to count 368 for Robbins, in 1894 gives 368 Democratic votes to 1 Republican, while in 1882, when there was no dispute as to the accuracy of the returns, it gave 3 for the Democrats and 187 for the Republicans. River precinct, which gives 376 in 1894 for the Democrats and nothing for the Republicans, in 1882 gave nothing for the Democrats and 133 for the Republican candidate. Oldtown precinct, where they want to count 278 for the Democratic contestee, in 1882 did not give a single Democratic vote, but gave a Republican candidate 145 votes. Union precinct, in 1894, 293 for the Democrats and nothing for the Republicans; in 1882 it gave nothing for the Democrats and 269 for the Republicans. Pences precinct, which gives 30 for the Democrats in 1894 and nothing for the Republicans, in 1882 gave nothing for the Democrats and 150 for the Republicans. Elm Bluff precinct, 123 for the Democratic candidate in 1894 and 12 for the Republicans, in 1882 gave 5 for the Democrats and 72 for the Republicans. Boykins precinct, 24 for the Democratic candidate in 1894 and 1 for the Republican, in 1882 gave nothing for the Democratic candidate and 93 for the Republican. Mitchells precinct, 386 in 1894 for the Democrats and nothing for the Republicans, gave in 1882—and there is no dispute, as I have said, but that the election was honest—nothing for the Democratic and 307 for the Republican candidate.

Now, my friends, will you call that an honest election that shows such a wonderful change in these few years? Can any man, after going through the evidence and looking it over as carefully as we have done, say that there was an honest election in that district? In fact, my friends, there is such abundant evidence of fraud that our Democratic friends themselves threw out all but four of the contested precincts, and we owe it to ourselves, we owe it to the dignity of the House, we owe it to the community and to the whole country at large, that no man shall occupy a seat in this House whose title to it is so besmirched with fraud as in this case. [Applause.]

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, the Speaker submitted the following changes of reference: Senate bill No. 1469, which was referred to the Committee on Claims, was referred to the Committee on War Claims; Senate bill No. 823, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on Pensions, and Senate bill No. 728, from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (S. 227) to authorize the Auditor for the War Department to audit certain quartermaster's vouchers alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo.; when the Speaker signed the same.

The motion of Mr. DANIELS was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 13, 1896.

Prayer by Rev. WALLACE RADCLIFFE, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a slight correction in the RECORD. I notice at the bottom of page 2725, in the speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday, that he said:

> Besides, we had the secret history of the correspondence with Spain. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] went to the State Department and was furnished by the Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, with all those private papers, which show more than any other the condition of affairs in Spain and the purposes of that country as therein revealed. As a matter of course, the contents of those papers were never disclosed to the public at large. We had the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, who went over the correspondence and communicated it to us, and we never revealed it in any way.

If I had been in the Senate Chamber at the time, I should have asked the permission of the Senator from Ohio to make the correction which I will make now. I did not receive any papers from the State Department, nor did I have any communication with the Secretary of State whatever in regard to the Cuban question. The papers to which the Senator from Ohio referred came to the committee direct from the State Department. They included a long and elaborate statement from the Spanish minister of the Spanish view of the case and the Spanish side, which I examined personally with great care, and which was also read to the committee by one of its members, and was the first subject of examination when we took up the consideration of the Cuban question. Those papers, as the Senator from Ohio stated, were, of course, confidential; they could not be printed or quoted. The Senator from Ohio referred quite correctly to the confidential nature of the papers, showing that we had the Spanish side fully before us, but by inadvertence he stated that they had come through me. They had not come through me; I had nothing to do with them, except that I saw them after they had been received by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now remember, and I am quite satisfied that I made a mistake in referring to the Senator from Massachusetts as having received the papers from the State Department. I now recall the entire fact. The Senator from Massachusetts took a great deal of interest in the documents as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I probably confounded that fact with the statement I made. The truth was, as is shown by our records, and as I now recollect distinctly, that the Secretary of State, at our request, sent to us the communications. They were referred to a subcommittee of which the Senator from Massachusetts was a member, and he took an active part in examining them, and they were read fully and in detail by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the committee. I suppose that I confounded the interest taken by the Senator from Massachusetts on the subsequent day with the reception by the committee of the papers.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations whether that Spanish case, which the committee considered so carefully, could not be laid before the Senate in executive or confidential session, and why the committee should have the power of determining this question on evidence which we can not have and can not have any report of from the committee?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the question might very fairly come before the Senate in executive session, if the Senator will make such a motion. I would not care to discuss it now.

Mr. HOAR. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations ought to make the motion, and I hope he will make it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do anything that is thought right when we get into executive session, but I would not like to do it now.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will make the motion. If I may be allowed one observation in regard to what my honorable friend has said, it seems to me that is a very important consideration for the Senate. If we are doing this thing without the President and undertaking to commit this Government by a concurrent resolution, the Spanish minister is entirely justified in taking public cognizance of our action, of which the Senator complained yesterday.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat, as well as to the chairman of the committee, that we are placed in a somewhat unusual dilemma. If it is essential, which I think it is not, that Congress in acting upon the question of these resolutions should act upon the question of belligerency, we are confronted with the proposition that we must vote upon a question of fact on testimony that reposes in the breasts of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations alone, which they can not divulge to the public and can divulge to us only in executive session, and that then the resolutions must go to another Chamber which has no executive session and which can never know the facts, and the members of that body must absolutely, without knowledge of a single one of the facts upon which the committee has reached a conclusion, vote in favor of or against belligerency. I should be glad to have explained to me, not being one of the oldest Senators, whether or not we are expected to yield our judgment and our conscience so that we are to follow the opinions, intelligently formed, of the Committee on Foreign Relations, based upon information which can never be divulged to us.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to say just a word. I hope that there may be some declaration prepared in which we can all join with satisfaction, and with a view to that possibility, when the proper time comes, I shall move that the Senate insist upon its resolutions and ask for a further conference.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of the claim of the Sac and Fox Indians of the Mississippi now residing in the State of Iowa, prepared in conformity with the provisions of the act of March 2, 1895; which, with the accompanying statement, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation to retire and cancel United States notes called "greenbacks" and Treasury notes called "Sherman notes"; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LINDSAY presented the petition of James M. Hollingworth and 6 other citizens of Pittsburg, Pa.; the petition of W. S. Liston and 17 other citizens of Fulton, Kans., and the petition of D. Young and 29 other citizens of Ottawa, Kans., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition of the Summit Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Pawnee City, Nebr., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Real Estate Exchange of Omaha, Nebr., praying that an appropriation be made for a national exhibit at the transmississippi and international exposition to be held at Omaha, Nebr., in 1898; which was referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition of 46 citizens of Pawnee City, Nebr., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PEFFER. I present the petition of Gen. Hugh Cameron, of Douglas County, Kans., praying that the 5th day of April be made a holiday, to be known as Resurrection Day. If the Senate will indulge me, as it is quite brief, I should like to state the reasons the General gives for asking this legislation.

Your petitioner, the undersigned, respectfully asks your honorable bodies to make the 5th day of April a national holiday, it being the day on which the King of the Jews, whom Pontius Pilate caused to be crucified, April 3, A. D. 33, achieved His splendid victory over the grave.

This King of the Jews has always been a true friend to the United States of America. He was with Washington and his compatriots during their great struggle for independence, and was also with the Union Army through the entire war to maintain that independence with union and liberty.

Your petitioner has an abiding faith that your honorable bodies will cheerfully grant his request, as well on your own account as that of the multitude of His faithful followers comprising all the industrious poor people—God's chosen people—many of whom are now prayerfully waiting for the second coming of said King, which, it is claimed, will be to the United States of America.

Unquestionably this King has done more to establish and maintain free government on this continent and to make the United States of America a respectable nation than any other king; and so we, as individuals and as a nation, ought not to be ashamed, with frankness and alacrity, to acknowledge that we owe Him a debt of gratitude which we will never be able fully to liquidate.

For all these and many other obvious reasons the undersigned hopes your honorable bodies will, without delay, make Resurrection Day a national holiday, for which he will continually pray.

Respectfully,

HUGH CAMERON, Lawrence, Kans.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of 16 citizens of Wakeman, Ohio, remonstrating against the introduction of military training in the public schools of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of 10 citizens of Franklin Square, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation giving second-class mail matter, such as religious tracts, full advantage of the act of July 16, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of 36 citizens of Wellsville, Ohio, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of sundry citizens of California, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Petaluma, Cal., remonstrating against the appropriation of moneys for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KYLE presented a petition of sundry citizens of South Dakota, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of N. F. Mayer and sundry other citizens of Wakonda, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation regulating the sale and manufacture of filled cheese; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented the memorial of E. A. Merrell and sundry other citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of Starry Flag Council, No. 158, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of New Providence, N. J., and a petition of Viola Council, No. 20, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Penns Grove, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg., praying that an appropriation be made to complete the canal and locks of the Columbia River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of 109 citizens of Linn County, Oreg., a petition of sundry citizens of Portland, Oreg., and a petition of 29 citizens of Oregon, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of 84 citizens of Delaware, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I suppose it is so designated in opposition to an irreligious amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon subsequently said: I did not hear the remark of the Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago, in which he made reference to some irreligious amendment to the Constitution of the United States supposed to have been introduced by me. Fearing that it might go out to the country that I had introduced some irreligious proposition of that kind, I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he did not intend to refer to my joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution so that United States Senators shall be elected by a direct vote of the people?

Mr. HOAR. I did, Mr. President.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That was the reference the Senator made?

Mr. HOAR. I supposed the Senator could hardly take it seriously; I supposed he heard what I said when I called attention to it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I did not take the remark either seriously or otherwise, because I did not hear it. I was told what had occurred; and it is all a joke.

Mr. HOAR presented petitions of 25 citizens of Massachusetts, of sundry citizens of Massachusetts, of 14 citizens of Maryland, of 17 citizens of Pennsylvania, and of sundry citizens of Beaver Falls, Pa., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BERRY presented a petition of 90 citizens of Siloam Springs, Ark., praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRICE presented the memorial of Mrs. H. B. Wisner, State superintendent of the juvenile department of the Ohio Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Berea, Ohio, remonstrating against the introduction of military training in the public schools of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of 57 citizens of Ohio, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ohio, and a petition of 15 citizens of New Philadelphia, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation giving second-class mail matter, such as religious tracts, full advantage of the act of July 16, 1894; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BURROWS presented the petition of J. Luck and 53 other citizens of Michigan, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the protection of agricultural staples by an export duty; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. DANIEL presented the petition of Hon. A. P. Staples, Maj. Samuel Griffin, Hon. J. Hampton Hoge, Judge William Gordon Robinson, J. Allen Watts, and sundry other citizens of Roanoke, Va., praying for the establishment of a United States court at that city; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALTHALL presented a concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of Mississippi, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to grant belligerent rights to the Cuban Republic; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution. Memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to grant belligerent rights to the Cuban Republic, and asking our Representatives and Senators in the Congress to vote for securing the same.

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of Mississippi, That we extend our sympathy to the Cuban people in their struggle for freedom and independence, and we call on the Congress and the President of these United States and request them to grant belligerent rights to the Cuban Republic, and ask our Representatives and Senators in the Congress to vote for securing the same, and that the secretary of state be instructed to transmit a copy of the resolution to the President and Congress.

Passed the house January 29, 1896.

JAMES F. McCOOL,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the Senate February 10, 1896.

J. H. JONES,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 24, 1896.

A. J. McLAURIN, Governor.
J. L. POWER, Secretary of State.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, relative to the granting of pensions by the National Government to soldiers and sailors confined in Confederate prisons; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six.

Resolutions relative to the granting of pensions by the National Government to soldiers and sailors confined in Confederate prisons.

Whereas a bill is now before the Congress of the United States granting pensions to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons; and

Whereas many officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Federal Army and Navy were confined in so-called Confederate prisons for a great length of time, suffering unusual hardships and contracting diseases and disabilities difficult to fully prove under existing pension laws: Therefore, for the purpose of doing justice to a specially deserving class of surviving veterans of the war,

Be it resolved, That the senators and representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in general court assembled, believe in the justice and equity of House bill No. 306 to those that served our Government as prisoners of war during the war of the rebellion, and request the Senators and Representatives from this Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States to use their influence in favor of the passage of said bill.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions, properly attested, be transmitted by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and also to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives, adopted February 27, 1896; in senate, adopted in concurrence March 3, 1896.

WM. M. OLIN,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 11th instant intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, reported it favorably, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that it be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1598) for the relief of J. A. McCreary, late of the United States Navy, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1169) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue Springfield rifles to each State and Territory for the National Guard thereof in exchange for other rifles now held, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5488) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 913) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1665) granting a pension to Rita Stine, amounting to $20 per month, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1828) to authorize the Auditor for the Interior Department to settle and adjust the accounts of E. C. Chirouse, Indian agent at the Tulalip Agency, Wash., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1996) amending the act of June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to authorize the President to appoint an officer of the Navy or the Marine Corps to perform the duties of solicitor and judge-advocate-general, etc., and to fix the rank and pay of such officer," and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1968) for the relief of the Mobile Marine Dock Company, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. DUBOIS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5819) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of California, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 18) to authorize the purchase of the painting by Victor Nehlig, representing Pocahontas saving the life of Capt. John Smith, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1923) granting to the city of Bismarck, N. Dak., the right to lease and use for public purposes Sibley Island, an island in the Missouri River, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported the bill (S. 2512) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the joint resolution of July 12, 1862, and the act of March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 55) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863, reported adversely thereon, and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1741) to authorize the Muskogee, Oklahoma and Western Railroad Company to construct and operate a line of railway through Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. THURSTON on the 4th instant, intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

COL. WARREN S. REESE.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that Col. Warren S. Reese, of Alabama, an applicant for a seat in this Chamber, be accorded the privileges of the floor during the discussion of resolution 54.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BATE. I suggest that neither of the Senators from Alabama is present.

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose that this is a privilege ordinarily accorded as a matter of course without objection. If the Senator from Tennessee objects to my request, I shall withdraw it.

Mr. HILL. I think it had better go over.

Mr. ALLEN. I withdraw the request.

Mr. BATE. I merely suggested the absence of both Senators from Alabama.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn.

PRINTING FOR NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7137) to provide for printing and binding for the Navy Department, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 2505) to amend an act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BURROWS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2506) providing that all official advertising in the District of Columbia shall be placed in only one daily newspaper, and awarded to the lowest bidder; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committe on Printing.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2507) granting a pension to John N. Corgan, of McPherson, Kans.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 2508) to establish a customs port of delivery at Pueblo, Durango, and Leadville, Colo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2509) to authorize the erection of a statue of the late President Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2510) for the relief of Thomas D. Gold, administrator of Zebedee Gray, of Clarke County, in the State of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2511) for the relief of James H. Cromwell, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THE FINANCIAL POLICY.

Mr. PALMER submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate, First. That it is the policy of the United States to maintain the existing legal and commercial standard of value.

Second. That the unlimited coinage by the United States of silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver with forced legal-tender quality for all debts, public and private, would subvert the existing legal and commercial standard of value by establishing a standard of values based upon silver coinage only.

ORDERS FOR SEIZURE OF VESSELS.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what orders have been issued from the Treasury Department to seize vessels of the United States loaded with arms and munitions of war, with passengers on board, suspected to be destined for foreign ports, and under what authority of law such seizures and arrests have been made.

ALLEGED IMPRISONMENT OF AMERICAN CITIZENS BY SPAIN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, in response to a resolution of the Senate of March 2, a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by copies of correspondence, touching the arrest in Habana of Marcus E. Rodriguez, Luis Someillau y Azpeitia, and Luis Someillau y Vidal, citizens of the United States.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, March 13, 1896.

Mr. HOAR. That message is not in response to the resolution of last Monday?

Mr. CALL. No; it is in response to a resolution passed by the Senate some time since. I move that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 55) for the establishment of a light-house and fog signal at or near Big Oyster Bed Shoal, New Jersey; and

A bill (H. R. 4781) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River," approved February 18, 1893.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 227) to authorize the Auditor for the War Department to audit certain quartermasters' vouchers alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo.; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that, for the purpose of my remarks only, House bill 2749 may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he allow the Cuban resolutions to be taken up informally and then to be laid aside, so that we shall have no controversy.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not make any difference in the morning hour. This will not displace the Cuban resolutions. Those resolutions are a matter of privilege, and there is no unfinished business in the morning hour. So it does not make any difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. Then I give notice that after the Senator is through with his speech I shall call up the conference report on the Cuban resolutions.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question on that point.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not oppose the request of the Senator from Missouri. I rise in aid of that request. I wish to say that I desire to speak next upon the Du Pont resolution, but it will be inconvenient for me to go on before Monday. I shall then on Monday yield until Tuesday, if appealed to, provided the Cuban resolutions can be disposed of on Monday.

Mr. PLATT. I do not like the parceling out of the business of the Senate and the yielding of the floor to Senators upon one subject and another several days in advance. What fell from the lips of the Senator from New Hampshire is the occasion of my remarks at this time. He suggests that he wants to speak on Monday, but if the Cuban resolutions can be disposed of on that day he will yield until Tuesday and then speak on the Du Pont case.

Since the time of the report of the committee on the Cuban resolutions I have been, without any prepared speech, trying to find an opportunity to say something upon that subject; but as this matter goes on I shall be shut out by some agreement to take the vote at a fixed time and shall have no opportunity whatever. I do not like this way of doing business, and I do not propose to be a party to any agreement hereafter.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 55) for the establishment of a light-house and fog signal at or near Big Oyster Bed Shoal, New Jersey; and

A bill (H. R. 4781) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River," approved February 18, 1893.

THE REVENUE BILL AND SILVER COINAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated by the Senator from Missouri.

The Secretary read the bill by title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of the Government and provide against a deficiency.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I desire to address my remarks entirely to the substitute reported by the Finance Committee to this revenue measure. The substitute provides for opening the mints of the United States to the free and unlimited coinage of the standard silver dollar upon equal terms with gold, simply restoring the silver-dollar coinage to the position it occupied from 1837 to 1873. Another section provides for the coinage of the silver seigniorage in the Treasury Department and covering it into the Treasury, which would make a balance of about $53,000,000, and another requires that the Secretary of the Treasury shall use silver equally with gold in the redemption of the Treasury notes and the greenbacks.

Now, Mr. President, what is our present financial condition, our liabilities as a Government? We owe over $847,000,000 of United States bonds. Over $25,000,000 of these bonds are payable at our pleasure to-day and bear only 2 per cent interest, over $559,000,000 of these bonds are redeemable in 1907 and bear 4 per cent interest, $100,000,000 of these bonds are redeemable in 1904 and bear 5 per cent interest, $62,000,000 of them are redeemable in 1925 and bear 4 per cent interest, and $100,000,000, recently issued, are redeemable in 1925 and bear 4 per cent interest. In time of profound peace we have issued over $262,000,000 of bonds since January 1, 1894. We have $346,681,016 United States notes (greenbacks) and about $136,000,000 Treasury notes.

What was our financial condition on the 3d day of the present month? We had over $123,000,000 of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury and over $24,000,000 of standard silver dollars; and we had silver bullion of the coinage value of over $177,000,000, having cost only about $124,000,000, the seigniorage, the profit that would belong to the Government, being over $53,000,000. We had in the Treasury, besides these, over $14,000,000 of subsidiary coin, over $106,000,000 of United States notes or greenbacks, and over $30,000,000 of United States Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, and we had coined from 1878 up to 1896 over $423,000,000 of standard silver dollars.

What are the objections to this financial status? The objection is that the Treasury notes of July 14, 1890, and the United States notes or greenbacks are presented at the Treasury and gold demanded in their redemption, and the gold is paid and the notes come into the Treasury, and then the Secretary of the Treasury issues the notes in payment of the liabilities of the Government, as the law requires him to do, because when the notes are redeemed in gold the law requires them to be reissued and put in circulation. They are a legal tender in the payment of all debts and liabilities not otherwise specified; and if they were not reissued the volume of money would be contracted by that amount. Then they are gathered up and brought back to the Treasury and gold again demanded and gold again paid; and that this process has been kept up, like an endless chain, and the gold reserve has been depleted time after time.

This is a terrible condition in the estimation of some. What is the remedy? Let us consider the practical question. We see the condition. It is a plain proposition. The greenbacks and the Treasury notes, a full legal tender, are presented for redemption, are redeemed in gold, reissued, presented again and redeemed, and the gold reserve, so called, of $100,000,000 is depleted, bonds are issued for gold, the gold again taken, and bonds again issued. Now, what is the remedy? I will let the President speak for himself. The President, in his message of January 28, 1895 (substantially repeated in his annual message of December, 1895, and in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury), said:

> In my opinion the Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized to issue bonds of the Government for the purpose of procuring and maintaining a sufficient gold reserve and the redemption and cancellation of the United States legal-tender notes and the Treasury notes issued for the purchase of silver under the law of July 14, 1890.
> The principal and interest of these bonds should be payable on their face in gold, because they should be sold only for gold or its representative.
> I suggest that the bonds be issued in denominations of twenty and fifty dollars and their multiples and that they bear interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum. I do not see why they should not be payable fifty years from their date. We of the present generation have large amounts to pay if we meet our obligations, and long bonds are most salable. The Secretary of the Treasury might well be permitted, at his discretion, to receive on the sale of bonds the legal-tender and Treasury notes to be retired, and of course when they are thus retired or redeemed in gold they should be canceled.
> These bonds under existing laws could be deposited by national banks as security for circulation; and such banks should be allowed to issue circulation up to the face value of these or any other bonds so deposited, except bonds outstanding bearing only 2 per cent interest, and which sell in the market at less than par.

Mr. President, that is the remedy proposed by the gold advocates. Is that the only remedy? Is that the safest, wisest, and best remedy? That depends upon the law authorizing the issue of the obligations and the terms expressed upon their face. I will read one of the bonds; and I desire to say that all the bonds now outstanding are substantially in the same language. This is one of the 4 percents of 1895:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1895.

[Act of January 14, 1875.]

FOUR PERCENTS OF 1895.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Are indebted to —— —— or assigns in the sum of ——.

This bond is issued under authority of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, being one of the descriptions of bonds described in the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, as amended by the act of January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of February, 1925, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof, at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of February, May, August, and November in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Transferable on the books of this office.

Date of issue, ——.

Entered ——. Recorded ——.

——, ——,

Register of the Treasury.

In connection with this bond, I wish to read a greenback, a United States note, because the law applicable to the bonds is also applicable to the greenback. I read a United States note:

The United States will pay the bearer

FIVE DOLLARS.

Washington, D. C.

Then follow the signatures of the Treasurer of the United States and the Register of the Treasury.

Upon the back is printed:

This note is a legal tender at its face value for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

Then follows a provision prohibiting counterfeiting.

I have shown the law authorizing the issue of the bonds on their face. Now, I wish to read the act known as the "act to strengthen the public credit," passed March 18, 1869, the first law ever signed by President Grant. That law declared—

> That the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

An express declaration of gold and silver. I shall now read the act of January 14, 1875, providing for the resumption of specie payments:

> And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50.

There is the law authorizing the issue of bonds and authorizing the issue of the greenbacks, and it expressly recognizes both gold and silver coins as the money of final payment.

I want to read now a legislative interpretation and expression. I will read a concurrent resolution passed by the Senate of the United States on the 25th day of January, 1878, and by the House of Representatives on the 28th of January, 1878, known as the Matthews resolution:

> That all the bonds of the United States issued, or authorized to be issued, under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited, are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars, of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith, nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

That concurrent resolution was passed in the Senate by a vote of 43 yeas—23 Democrats, 18 Republicans, and 1 Independent (Judge Davis, of Illinois), on January 25, 1878, before the passage of the Bland-Allison law. The nays were only 22, over two-thirds of the Senate voting for its passage. Of these nays there were 7 Democrats and 15 Republicans. In the House of Representatives the yeas were 189—116 Democrats voting for it, including such distinguished Democratic leaders as Hon. John G. Carlisle, Hon. Hilary A. Herbert, ROGER Q. MILLS, William M. Springer, and many others. Against it were 79 nays—23 Democrats and 56 Republicans.

Mr. President, I say that these bonds, principal and interest, as well as the United States notes, can be paid just as legally and honestly in standard silver dollars as in gold. I want to read some authority on that question. On April 10, 1876, the distinguished gold monometallist-bimetallist, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], reported to the Senate a bill to amend the laws relating to legal-tender silver coin. That bill proposed that there should be coined at the mints of the United States a silver dollar of 412.8 grains troy of standard silver. That would make the exact ratio of 16 to 1. The first section of that bill provided:

> And the said dollar herein authorized shall be a legal tender, at its nominal value, for any amount not exceeding $20 in any one payment, except for customs dues and interest on the public debt, and shall be receivable in payment of all dues to the United States except duties on imports; and the trade dollar shall not be hereafter a legal tender.

Section 2 provided—

> That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exchange the silver dollars herein authorized for an equal amount of United States notes, which shall be retired and canceled, and not be again replaced by other notes. * * *

Section 3 provided—

> That any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at the mints, to be taken at its market value as ascertained and publicly announced from time to time by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to be paid for either in silver dollars or with gold coin or United States notes, or bullion for the coinage of said silver dollar may be procured in the mode provided for as to other silver coins. * * *

The Senator from Ohio proposed as early as 1876 to coin silver dollars at the ratio of 16 to 1, and with them to redeem, retire, and cancel every one of the greenbacks. In discussing that bill, on the 11th day of April, 1876, the Senator from Ohio used this language:

> But the vital question presented by the amendments of the committee is the restoration of the silver dollar. Why restore the silver dollar when it is now so depreciated by the events that I have named? Well, sir, the answer is that we have a large amount, some $400,000,000, of United States notes, which now are a legal tender for all purposes, and the time has arrived when we can redeem them all with the old dollar of the United States. We do not create a dollar; we simply provide for its issue. The law was, I have shown you, up to 1873, that this old silver dollar could be tendered for the payment of all debts; but it was simply not coined because the silver dollar was worth more than the gold dollar. Does that prevent us from coining it? Not in the least.
> The silver dollar was, it is true, a legal tender until 1873, and, in strict law, might be restored to its former position as a standard of value without a violation of the legal contract between the United States and the bondholder.

I shall now read from the act of February 28, 1878, "to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character":

That there shall be coined, at the several mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the devices and superscriptions provided by said act; which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States, of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender, at their nominal value, for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion, at the market price thereof, not less than $2,000,000 worth per month, nor more than $4,000,000 worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly, as fast as so purchased, into such dollars.

I will read again from the Senator from Ohio while he was Secretary of the Treasury. In the finance report of 1878 he said:

The Secretary deems it proper to state that in the meantime, in the execution of the law as it now stands, he will feel it to be his duty to redeem all United States notes presented on and after January 1 next at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50, with either gold or silver coin, as desired by the holder, but reserving—

Now, mark the language—

the legal option of the Government; and to pay out United States notes for all other demands on the Treasury, except when coin is demanded on coin liabilities.

Here was an express declaration of the Senator from Ohio in his finance report of 1878 that, while he would redeem those notes in gold, he reserved the legal option of the Government to redeem them in silver.

We have discussed the law in regard to the bonds and the greenbacks, and now I will read a Treasury note [exhibiting]. It reads:

The United States of America will pay to bearer $5 in coin.
Washington, D. C.

Upon the back of the note is the following:

This note is a legal tender at its face value in payment of all debts, public and private, except when otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

No gold there; it is simply payable in coin. Now, let me read the act of July 14, 1890, and see what that says:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion * * * at the market price thereof, * * * and to issue in payment of such purchases of silver bullion Treasury notes of the United States to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, in such form and of such denominations as he may prescribe, and a sum sufficient to carry into effect the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated. * *

SEC. 2. That the Treasury notes issued in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be redeemable on demand, in coin, at the Treasury of the United States, or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States, and when so redeemed may be reissued; and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued: and such notes, when held by any national banking association, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve. That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act into standard silver dollars until the 1st day of July, 1891, and after that time he shall coin—he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for, and any gain or seigniorage arising from such coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury.

Mark the language—

The unconditional repeal act of November 1, 1893, simply repealed the provisions of the law authorizing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes in its payment. It did not repeal any other part of the law of July 14, 1890, but left it in full force and effect, and it is expressly stipulated in this repeal law:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts.

Mr. President, there is not one line nor one word in any of these laws creating the obligations, or on the face of the obligations themselves, requiring payment in gold. I say to-day that there is but one solitary obligation of this Government which calls for payment in gold, and that obligation is the gold certificate. The redemption of greenbacks and Treasury notes in gold is a voluntary assumption on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, and is in direct opposition to the clause of the law of July 14, 1890, which says that he "shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for." Both greenbacks and Treasury notes are clearly redeemable in silver, equally as honestly and legally as in gold. The legislative will, clearly expressed, required such redemption in silver dollars as well as in gold.

Why was not this done? The exclusive use of gold has been purely voluntary. If the policy of redeeming in silver as well as gold had been carried out there would have been no trouble whatever. It was the general belief in this country up to 1891 that both were redeemable in gold and silver—in silver as well as in gold.

The report of the then Secretary of the Treasury, now the Senator from Ohio, in 1878, which I have quoted, prevented the presentation of the greenbacks with a demand for redemption in gold alone and prevented any raids on the Treasury for gold.

From January, 1879, the date of the resumption of specie payments, to July 1, 1891, the greenbacks presented for redemption were only a little over $34,000,000—$34,000,000 in thirteen years, only an annual average of $2,629,619, and not a Treasury note was ever presented for redemption prior to October 14, 1891; and yet we exported from January 1, 1879, to July 1, 1891, over $339,000,000 in gold. There was no raid on the Treasury.

Now, let us examine since October 14, 1891, or practically since July 1, 1891. From July 1, 1891, to October 1, 1895, $275,000,000 of greenbacks had been redeemed in gold. From July 14, 1891, to October 1, 1895, over $76,000,000 of Treasury notes had been redeemed in gold. Over $351,000,000 of gold was taken from the Treasury from July 1, 1891, to October 1, 1895, a little over four years, and yet in the thirteen preceding years, with $346,000,000 of greenbacks outstanding, only $34,000,000 had ever been presented for redemption, and we exported at the same time from July 1, 1891, to October 1, 1895, nearly $340,000,000 of gold. Both notes were used to raid the Treasury and take gold.

It is a remarkable thing that with this discrimination against the standard silver dollar over one hundred and forty millions in gold had been voluntarily exchanged for silver dollars or certificates prior to July 1, 1891.

There was no raid for gold prior to October 14, 1891. Why? Because of the general belief that the notes were redeemable in silver, and that the Government reserved the option to so redeem them, as stated by Secretary Sherman in his finance report of 1878, The silver dollars until October 14, 1891, were the watchdogs of the Treasury, the guardians of the Treasury, and infinitely more successful in keeping off gold raiders than the Rothschilds and the Belmonts have ever been since October 14, 1891——

Mr. STEWART. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I will suggest that they are still the watchdogs of the treasuries of France and Germany.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; everywhere else except in the United States. The voluntary surrender of the option to redeem in silver dollars caused the raids on the Treasury gold.

To sustain this statement I will read a letter from the Republican Club of Massachusetts to the Hon. Charles Foster:

REPUBLICAN CLUB OF MASSACHUSETTS,
258 Washington Street, Boston, October 8, 1891.

DEAR SIR: There is at present so much discussion in Massachusetts in regard to the act of July 14, 1890, that the Republican Club desires the views of the highest authority of the Treasury upon it, in order to put an end at once to all possible controversy.

The Republican Club of Massachusetts will be greatly obliged if you will kindly answer the following questions for publication:

First. Is it true that the act of July 14 increases two and a half times the coinage of 80 cents' worth of silver into a dollar?

Second. Is the Government at present coining silver? If not, when was the coinage stopped?

Third. Upon what are the present Treasury notes based? Are they secured by a coined silver dollar, or upon 100 cents' worth of silver bullion purchased at its market value in gold?

Fourth. How does the basis of the present notes differ from the silver certificates formerly issued?

Fifth. Are not the present notes redeemable in either gold or silver coin at the United States Treasury? Does the Government so redeem them when presented?

I have the honor to be, yours, truly, ELIHU B. HAYES,
Secretary of the Republican Club of Massachusetts.

Hon. CHARLES FOSTER, Secretary of the Treasury.

Here is Secretary Foster's reply:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., October 10, 1891.

SIR: Replying to the interrogatories relating to silver submitted in your communication of the 8th instant, I would say as follows:

First. The act of July 14, 1890, does not increase the coinage of silver dollars, but since the 1st of July of the present year has practically stopped such coinage.

The act provided for the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver a month, about two and a half times the amount purchased under the act of 1878, and the coinage into silver dollars of 2,000,000 ounces monthly (which was about the amount coined under the act of 1878) until the 1st of July of the present year.

After that date only such silver dollars were to be coined as were necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes issued in purchase of the silver bullion.

That is true. That is all that the law required; but it was never done. His answer goes on to say:

As no Treasury notes are being presented for redemption in silver dollars, the coinage of silver dollars from bullion purchased under this act has practically ceased since July 1, 1891.

Second. The mints are at present engaged in coining the silver bullion resulting from the redemption of trade dollars, as required by the act of March 3, 1891, and in recoining the subsidiary silver coins in the Treasury.

The mandatory coinage of silver dollars under the act of July 14, 1890, ceased July 1, 1891.

The total coinage of silver dollars under the act of July 14, 1890, from July 1 to October 1, 1891, has been only 366,000, mainly for use on the Pacific Coast.

Third. The present Treasury notes are issued in the first instance upon the purchase of silver bullion—4,500,000 ounces a month—at its market price.

The law requires that the cost of the silver bullion and the silver dollars coined therefrom held in the Treasury shall always equal the amount of Treasury notes outstanding, so that these notes practically have behind them a gold dollar's worth of silver bullion.

Fourth. The Treasury notes differ from the silver certificates in that they are redeemable in either gold or silver coin, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, with a provision of law to the effect that these two dollars shall be maintained at parity, which is a virtual promise that the notes shall always be redeemed in gold or its exact equivalent.

The silver certificates are a promise to pay a silver dollar which has been deposited in the Treasury at the time the certificate was issued, and they are receivable for Government dues. The language of it is:

"This certifies that there has been deposited in the Treasury of the United States one silver dollar, payable to the bearer on demand."

While the language of the Treasury note is:

"The United States of America will pay to bearer one dollar in coin."

In addition to being redeemable in gold or silver coin, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and practically under the pledge to maintain the two metals at parity in gold, the Treasury notes have, as stated above, behind each dollar practically a gold dollar's worth of silver bullion, while the present silver certificate is a promise to return to the bearer a silver dollar.

Fifth. Treasury notes are redeemed in gold when so presented for redemption at the Treasury or any assistant treasury of the United States.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES FOSTER, Secretary.

ELIHU B. HAYES, Esq.,
Secretary Republican Club of Massachusetts,
258 Washington street, Boston, Mass.

Now, what took place?

On October 13 the following telegram was sent to Secretary Foster:

BOSTON, MASS., October 13, 1891.

Noticing in your letter of October 10 to Republican Club, published here this morning, statement that Treasury notes are redeemed in gold at any assistant treasury, I sent a one-thousand-dollar note to subtreasury here this morning, requesting such redemption in gold. This was refused. If your letter correctly states policy of the Treasury, will you please send instructions to subtreasurer here to redeem notes in gold. An early answer earnestly requested.

PHINEAS PIERCE,
32 Summer Street.

Hon. CHARLES FOSTER,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Now, what was the answer?

OCTOBER 14, 1891.

PHINEAS PIERCE,
32 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.:

Assistant Treasurer Kennard has been instructed to redeem Treasury notes in gold.

CHAS. FOSTER, Secretary.

Charge Department.

Here is another telegram from Secretary Foster:

OCTOBER 14, 1891.

ASSISTANT TREASURER,
Boston, Mass.:

Why didn't you apply to United States Treasurer for instructions when Treasury notes are presented for redemption in gold?

CHAS. FOSTER, Secretary.

Here is the reply of Mr. Kennard:

OFFICE OF ASSISTANT TREASURER UNITED STATES,
Boston, Mass., October 14, 1891.

SIR: I have respectfully to own to the receipt of telegram of Treasurer United States "Redeem Treasury notes in gold, if presented and a demand made for such redemption"; also to your dispatch of even date "Why didn't you apply to United States Treasurer for instructions when Treasury notes are presented for redemption in gold?" to which I wired the following reply: "As no general demand had been made for the exchange of Treasury notes in gold, the occasion had not arisen for asking for specific instructions."

Very respectfully,

M. P. KENNARD,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

Hon. CHARLES FOSTER,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

I read from a letter of Mr. Kennard, who was the assistant treasurer of the United States in Boston at the time of this transaction, addressed to the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Hamlin, and I have the permission of Mr. Kennard to read the portions of the letter which I will read:

Personal.] SUBTREASURY UNITED STATES,
Boston, Mass., October 31, 1894.

DEAR MR. HAMLIN: I have the pleasure of replying to your note of the 26th instant. The date of the incident referred to was October 13, 1891, not 1890, as your note has it. When I returned to this office in January, 1891, I found the Treasury notes then in current circulation, and without other instructions they were issued and accepted on all sides as the representatives of silver rather than of gold till otherwise advised, and in the language of the law "redeemed at the discretion of the Secretary."

No specific instructions were ever received as to their redemption in gold, nor had the question ever been raised. The notes, it was tacitly understood, had inherited their silver character from the act of Congress which created them and which explicitly directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the silver bullion "from time to time" "and to issue these notes in payment for such purchases." Up to October 13, 1891, there was not a bank officer in town that ever entertained the idea of receiving gold in exchange for those notes. My predecessor, Mr. Aldrich, confirms this. The current sentiment was that they would ultimately supersede the silver certificates (the Secretary controlling the alternative), and this office was alternately supplied with both without comment. Gold notes were then abundantly available for all requirements and always tendered for gold coin without friction.

The exigency for the test of the exact bearing of those notes had not arrived till mischievously forced by the Continental Bank, the president of which subsequently informed me that had he been present it would not have occurred.

There was then a public sensitiveness as to the Government gold reserve. The banks saw this and that the redemption of those notes in gold opened the doors to nearly sixty million of them then in circulation. That demand of the Continental Bank was so unusual that the well-informed chief teller of this office, of more than twenty-five years' service, came to my desk for instructions, and as there was no precedent and in the absence of any instructions from the Department, I decided I had no right to redeem such notes with gold until further advised. On the 14th I was instructed by the Treasurer by wire to "redeem Treasury notes in gold, if presented and a demand made for such redemption."

This was the first intimation to this office from the Treasurer that those Treasury coin notes should be so treated.

Faithfully, yours,

M. P. KENNARD.

Hon. C. S. HAMLIN,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, that opened Pandora's box, and all the financial ills that have resulted in this country since October 14, 1891, have been simply because the Secretary of the Treasury surrendered voluntarily, meekly, submissively the right of the Government to redeem those notes in silver as well as in gold. The record shows it. They were never presented. Not a dollar of Treasury notes were presented until October 14, 1891, for redemption either in gold or silver. They were a legal tender, and nobody wanted them redeemed. This surrender by the Republican Administration was voluntary and was in defiance of the express law and the purpose of the law and the expressed will of Congress. The executive branch had no right on earth to surrender this option. It was in disobedience to legislation; it was in disobedience to the expressed will of Congress. It was not in the interest of the people. It was not in the interest of the masses. It might do in a monarchy, but not in a republican government. We are the only nation on this earth with full legal-tender gold and silver coins and a paper currency redeemable in coin that has surrendered its option and invited gold raiders and gold speculators to come with the Treasury notes and greenbacks and get gold.

Secretary Foster redeemed not one solitary Treasury note in silver. Secretary Carlisle has redeemed more than $19,377,000 of the Treasury notes with standard silver dollars, and has retired and canceled them, and no harm has come. Had every ounce of the silver bullion in the Treasury been coined into standard silver dollars and every Treasury note redeemed and canceled no harm would have come. Secretary Foster redeemed in gold from the 14th day of October, 1891, to the expiration of his term, over $34,000,000 of the Treasury notes, and Secretary Carlisle up to October last had redeemed over $43,000,000. Over $41,000,000 of them were presented at Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. It was simply a meek surrender to the gold gamblers, as a convenience to them to get gold upon which to speculate. There is no law upon the statute book requiring the Treasury to maintain $100,000,000 gold reserve. Secretary Carlisle has so decided. All the funds in the Treasury are deposited in the general cash.

Now, let us look as to what has been done by reason of this meek and unjust and improper surrender of the option of the Government to pay in silver as well as in gold. To maintain this imaginary gold reserve of $100,000,000 the executive administration, January, 1894, sold $50,000,000 of 5 per cent ten-year bonds for over $58,000,000 of gold, and put the gold in the Treasury and proclaimed its purpose to continue to redeem greenbacks and Treasury notes in gold whenever demanded.

From January, 1894, to November, 1894, $103,000,000 of gold was taken out of the Treasury, and in November, 1894, the Government issued and sold $50,000,000 more of ten-year 5 per cent bonds for more than $58,000,000 of gold, and put the gold in the Treasury and used the Treasury notes to pay current expenses. More raids were made. It had only whetted the appetites of the bond lovers and the gold-standard advocates to get more bonds and to fasten the gold standard by permanent legislation naming gold as the money of final payment. Between the sale of bonds in November, 1894, and the 28th of January, 1895—only about two months—$69,000,000 of gold was taken from the Treasury. On January 28, 1895, the President gave to Congress the message I have quoted, recommending the issue of $500,000,000 of bonds payable in gold. In February, 1895, Congress having refused to authorize the issue of any gold bonds, the executive administration issued and sold more than $62,000,000 of thirty-year 4 per cent bonds for a little over $65,000,000 under the now famous, if not otherwise, Rothschild-Belmont-Morgan syndicate contract to guard our Treasury. Sixty-two million dollars of United States thirty-year bonds were sold at the rate of $104.50. They have since sold in the open market at over $123.

A magnificent speculation called patriotism. Think of it! Pæans of praise sung to the Belmonts and the Rothschilds and the Morgans for their patriotism in buying American bonds at $104.50 on the $100 and then selling them for $123 for every $100 of bonds. But the raids were renewed, and only recently $100,000,000 more of thirty-year 4 per cent bonds were sold for $111,000,000 and a little over, as reported, a total increase of our bonded interest-bearing debt of more than $262,000,000 in time of profound peace. To do what? To maintain the gold reserve and to show our patriotism.

That reminds me of a little squib that I saw in the financial circular of Dimock & Co., of New York. Speaking of the patriotism of the bond speculators and gold gamblers, referring to the last bond sale, they say:

It was purely a matter of business, and not of patriotism. Uncle Sam set up a bargain counter and marked down his staple goods for one day. One boy with a capital of a postage stamp bought $150,000 of bonds and sold them for $6,000 profit before he had paid for them. A thrifty Boston man and his wife bought ten times as many bonds at a corresponding profit on an investment of 44 cents. The syndicate bid for one hundred millions, was awarded thirty-three millions, and sold its bonds for a profit of $1,800,000 before it had paid for them. The syndicate was just three hundred times as patriotic as the small boy.

[Laughter.]

What is this proposed remedy, Mr. President? We have seen it. It is a miserable makeshift. It simply substitutes for a noninterest-bearing debt, for the full legal-tender greenbacks and Treasury notes—mere demand obligations, whose debt quality has been absorbed in their money function, and which are to-day money used by the people in the daily transactions—an equal amount of interest-bearing gold bonds. It contracts the legal-tender currency of the country to that amount, reduces the selling price of all the products of the soil, the mine, and the factory, and is in violation of that cardinal principle of every honest republican government that when in debt it should maintain in circulation the largest possible amount of its indebtedness in the shape of noninterest-bearing obligations that the people of the country will keep in circulation without depreciation.

What is further proposed in the proposition of the President? To surrender to the national banks the absolute control of the paper circulation. It proposes to give to the banks the right to deposit bonds, draw interest upon the bonds thus deposited in the Treasury, and then receive from the Treasury dollar for dollar of legal-tender money and loan it to the people at interest—double interest, interest upon the bonds paid by the Government and interest upon the loans paid by the money borrowers. The banks invest their capital and receive interest upon it, get an equal amount of money, and then receive interest upon that from the borrowers. In 1895 we paid to the national banks over $8,000,000 in interest on their bonds, and they were loaning to the people an amount equal to 90 per cent of those bonds and receiving the highest rate of interest that the people would pay.

It is a proposition to issue fifty-year bonds. Never in the history of this great Republic has any man ever before proposed to issue a fifty-year bond. It is in direct violation of that great principle proclaimed by the immortal Jefferson that a republic has no right to issue a bond running longer than twenty years, because we of this generation have no right to bind coming generations of Amercan freemen in a government of the people and by the people.

Fifty-year bonds! It is a perpetuation of the national debt, a curse. It is anti-Democratic; it is contrary to the inaugural of the immortal Jefferson, the honest payment of the public debt, and the sacred preservation of the public faith. It is in direct conflict with the Democratic platform of 1840:

That Congress has no power to charter a United States bank; that we believe such an institution one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power and above the laws and the will of the people.

Mr. MILLS. That is a quotation from Jefferson.

Mr. COCKRELL. A quotation from Jefferson. I thank the Senator from Texas for the suggestion.

That platform was readopted by the national Democratic convention of 1844, and again in 1848, and again in 1852, and again in 1856, and again in 1860—a cardinal monumental principle of the Democratic party, a beacon light. This financial policy is in direct conflict with it.

The proposed remedy, Mr. President, is too costly to the toiling millions of this country. It is the costliest remedy for financial ills that any executive officer of any Government on this earth ever proposed. This tame surrender of the option to use silver and the efforts to maintain the gold standard have already burdened the masses of the people with interest-bearing bonds which, when paid, principal and interest, will have cost them $506,093,880. That is permanently fixed upon the taxpayers of this country. Now, carry out this remedy and issue $500,000,000 more of 3 per cent fifty-year bonds to retire the legal-tender notes used as money, and it would cost when paid at maturity with interest, $1,250,000,000, making $1,756,093,880.

That is not all of this proposed remedy for our financial ills. It proposes to give the national banks entire control of the paper currency. Suppose they issue only $350,000,000 of notes and then loan them to the people for fifty years, say, at only 5 per cent interest; the money borrowers will pay in interest $17,500,000 annually, $875,000,000 of interest in the fifty years. Carry out your grand financial remedy, and it will cost the taxpayers and the money borrowers at the end of fifty years $2,631,093,880. For what purpose of humanity? All done to maintain our credit, our financial standing. Think of it! In 1865, with a population of 34,748,000, we had an indebtedness of more than $2,845,000,000. With a country nearly half of which was devastated, just emerging from the grandest civil contest that was ever waged in this world, we had that burden. What have we done since?

We have paid since August 31, 1865, to August 31, 1893, in principal and interest on the bonded indebtedness of the United States $4,072,207,945, and in the ordinary expenses of the Government $6,953,990,881. We paid over $11,036,198,837 in that time. Now we are a nation of 70,000,000 people, united and, according to the gold advocates, extremely prosperous, happy, and free, and yet to maintain our financial credit and standing this enormous burden is proposed to be placed on the shoulders of the taxpayers, almost equal to the aggregate of the debt at the close of the war.

Mr. SQUIRE. How much was the interest paid, as part of the public debt, at that time?

Mr. COCKRELL. The total interest paid from August 31, 1865, to August 31, 1893, was $2,370,616,966. For the fiscal year 1866, $133,067,624, and for 1867, $143,781,591, the largest amount ever paid in one year. We only had about $600,000,000 of bonds, when the process of sustaining the credit and standing of the United States was begun. Then we had an indebtedness of $2,845,000,000 in 1865.

Now, Mr. President, the question arises, can the national banks maintain gold redemption? If the whole United States can not maintain a gold reserve, can the national banks do it? It is a pertinent question. To retire the United States notes is to transfer the whole of the demand for gold on the banks, their notes then being redeemable only in gold. Now, if they can maintain the gold redemption of their circulation, it will prove conclusively, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that there has existed and now exists a combine, to say the least of it, to raid the gold reserve, force the issue of bonds, vest in them the absolute control of our currency, and then, when clothed with this absolute power to manage and direct the currency of the country, redeem it or not, just as they choose, and just as they did in 1893, when they refused to honor drafts in money to their customers and country banks, and resorted to $38,000,000 of clearing-house certificates in the city of New York.

The people have not forgotten what was done in 1881 by the national banks on the attempt of Congress to reduce the interest on bonds, when they retired $18,000,000 of their currency in one day and produced an incipient panic, nor have they forgotten the violation, the flagrant, open violation, of the law of July 12, 1882, extending the charters of the national banks.

The law of July 12, 1882, provides that—

No national banking association shall be a member of any clearing house in which such [gold and silver] certificate shall not be receivable in the settlement of clearing-house balances.

There it is. The law to-day standing upon your statute books prohibits a national bank from being a member of any clearing house that refuses silver dollars and silver certificates. When the silver agitation began, or soon after the passage of the silver law of February 28, 1878, on the 12th day of November, 1878, the clearing house adopted a rule prohibiting the payment of balances at the clearing house in silver certificates or silver dollars except as subsidiary coins in small sums under $10. February 28, 1878, was the date of the law authorizing the coinage of the standard silver dollar and making it full legal tender. November 12, 1878, the clearing house of New York passed its resolution. In 1882, the fact coming to the knowledge of Congress, we inserted in the national bank charter renewal act the provision that I have read, and yet ever since they have been in open defiance of that law, and are to-day.

The right to issue a paper currency is the right of sovereignty. It does not belong to private institutions. It is not the legitimate function of banking. It is the sovereign function of government. Now, confine the banks to their legitimate function of deposits, loans, drafts, and bills of exchange, and let the Government continue exercising its sovereign function of issuing the money of the people, and nobody will complain.

Mr. President, it is easy to criticise a policy, but what should have been done instead of this disastrous, costly policy, paralyzing to the business of the country? The answer is plain. The executive branch, in obedience to the legislative will and to existing law, should have reserved the option to redeem in silver dollars as well as gold; should have coined all the silver bullion in the Treasury into standard silver dollars; should have redeemed and canceled every one of the Treasury notes and retired them, as the law required, when redeemed in silver dollars; should have redeemed the greenbacks in silver dollars as well as gold, and to-day we would not have one solitary dollar of Treasury notes outstanding. Every one of them would have been redeemed and canceled. In lieu of them, we would have had outstanding an equal amount of standard silver dollars and $53,000,000 of surplus added to the balance in the Treasury, which would have prevented the issue of any bonds to replete the Treasury exhaustion, and not one dollar of the $262,000,000 bonded indebtedness would be in existence to-day.

There is no power on this earth that could have prevented the success of that policy. What could they have done? Now, think of it as intelligent, sensible men. Who could have prevented the success of that policy? The Secretary of the Treasury had the silver bullion and the law requiring him to coin it. He could have coined it and redeemed and canceled every one of the Treasury notes. Who could have prevented it? The greenback is redeemable in silver as well as gold. Redeem it in silver, and what is the result? Who can prevent it? Who can do anything? Who can harm the people of the United States? Now, where is there any danger? Why, Mr. President, it is a mere nightmare dream of gold monomania, and nothing else. There could have been no possibility of the failure of this plan.

Now, I want to bring some evidence in regard to this matter. Secretary Carlisle on the 21st of January, 1895, was examined before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, and there was asked why the Government did not reserve the option of redeeming in silver as well as in gold. In his reply he says:

* * * But if the policy of reserving to the Government, at the beginning of resumption, the option of redeeming in gold or silver all its paper presented, I believe it would have worked beneficially, and there would have been no trouble growing out of it, but the Secretaries of the Treasury from the beginning of resumption have pursued a policy of redeeming in gold or silver, at the option of the holder of the paper, and if any Secretary had afterwards attempted to change that policy and force silver upon a man who wanted gold, or gold upon a man who wanted silver, and especially if he had made that attempt at such a critical period as we have had in the last two years, my judgment is it would have been very disastrous.

Always disaster coming when any relief is proposed by the use of silver. There it is, Mr. President. Mr. Secretary Carlisle forgets the record. He forgets that Secretary Sherman in his finance report of 1878, while redeeming the greenbacks in gold, intimated that he reserved the right to the Government to redeem them in silver, and no greenbacks were presented for redemption to amount to anything for thirteen years. Only a little over $2,000,000 were presented a year. The Treasury notes were issued under the law of July 14, 1890, and not one of them was ever presented for redemption either in gold or silver until October 14, 1891, when Secretary Foster had proclaimed to the world his intention of redeeming them in gold, a proclamation to the world: "Come and take our gold; we give you the option; we throw it away; we place it in your hands."

Now, Mr. President, I submit that in 1892, when a majority of the electoral votes of the United States were cast for the Democratic executive branch, it was believed that it made a change of policy, not a mere change of the personnel of the executive chair and the heads of Departments and substituting for them others to carry out the policies of their predecessors, which had been condemned at the polls. But they tell us in defense of this meek surrender and this trailing after the former Administration policies that it is done to maintain the parity. They say that the law of 1890 required the maintenance of the parity of the metals. Here is the language:

It being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio.

Now, mark you, it is not to preserve the parity of the two coins, their equal debt-paying and purchasing power, but it is to maintain the parity of the two metals. They say that clause controls the Secretary's discretion. In order to maintain the parity of the two metals the Secretary has paid out gold instead of silver. Has he maintained the parity of the two metals? Let us see how he has carried out the policy. The bullion value of the silver in the dollar in 1891, when this parity process was begun, was 84.31 cents; in 1893 it was 65.20 cents; in 1894 it was 56.56 cents; in 1895 the highest was 52.683 cents and the lowest was 46.27 cents, an average of 49.168 cents. These figures are taken from the mint report of 1895.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senator from Missouri may conclude his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The effort to maintain the parity of the two metals has resulted in a clear reduction of 35.142 cents on the value of the metal in the silver dollar, and they call that maintaining the parity. Now I will read the repeal clause in the law of November 1, 1893:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value—of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts.

The pretext that they must maintain the parity of the two metals no longer holds. There is no obligation to do it; it is a mere pretext to evade the use of silver.

Mr. President, I have discussed this proposed financial plan. Let us reason together. Error is not dangerous when reason is left free to combat it. What does the proposed remedy of the President mean? It means a gold standard pure and simple, gold monometallism. Gold monometallism means that gold shall be the only standard of value and money of final payment and redemption of all the billions upon billions of indebtedness of the entire country. It means that all other kinds of money, whether composed of silver or of paper currency, shall be redeemable in gold, the only money of final payment, or the coin money shall be limited in its legal-tender power to a small sum. What does the euphonious term "sound money" mean? It means gold monometallism pure and simple; it is no longer a guise to cover up the gold standard. Secretary Carlisle, in his speeches recently in New York, has proclaimed for the single standard of gold. The New York Chamber of Commerce have issued their pronunciamento to the commercial men of the United States that we must maintain the present gold standard of value. The President in his message says: "Issue these bonds and have them upon their face call for gold." The Kansas City Times, a Democratic paper in western Missouri, boldly comes out and advocates the single gold standard. The issue, then, is the gold standard on one side and bimetallism on the other. I stand to-day to advocate bimetallism, the Democratic, constitutional system of this country, and to oppose the gold standard. To this gold standard there are, in my opinion, fatal objections. The first one is, it is contrary to our Constitution and the bimetallic system therein established. What does our Constitution say?

The Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins, and fix the standard of weights and measures—no State shall * * * coin money * * * or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

And that—

The only power given is "to coin money"; that is, to coin gold and silver into money, and then to regulate the value of such coined money; that is, to declare the legal tender, the debt-paying power, of such coined money and of foreign coins.

Gold and silver metals are clearly not money, and never become money until coined in pursuance of a law of Congress. This money, coined from both gold and silver at the ratio fixed by Congress, is the money of our Constitution; is honest, sound, safe, irredeemable, absolute money of final payment, the end of the law in the payment and satisfaction of all money obligations, and is the only true and legal measure of the values of all property, and is inherently, intrinsically, and honestly of the exact value of its legal-tender power in all payments. Each State clearly has the right to make this money, the gold and silver coins, a lawful tender in the payment of debts, but can not deny to either coin such legal tender. Congress can not take from any State this clear right. No power is given to Congress to regulate or fix the commercial value of gold and silver as metals, or to declare that our coins of gold and silver, or either, shall not be money, or to demonetize either gold or silver.

Daniel Webster said in his speech of December 21, 1836:

I am clearly of the opinion that gold and silver, at rates fixed by Congress, constitute the legal standard of value in this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard, or to displace this standard.

That is an objection which can not be refuted and can not be overcome, and no one has pretended to make an argument here against it.

But, Mr. President, I am opposed to the single gold standard because it is contrary to the record, the principles, and the traditions of the Democratic party for a century of our constitutional existence. From March 4, 1801, to March 4, 1861, the Democratic party and its principles dominated and had controlling influence in the enactment and administration of our laws and Government. During this period our constitutional bimetallic system, the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver into honest, sound, safe, full legal-tender money at the ratio fixed by Congress, first at 15 to 1, and then by the laws of 1834 and 1837 changed by reducing the quantity of gold to the dollar to 15.988 to 1, or, as usually called, 16 to 1, was maintained and continued up to 1873, when it was destroyed and the single gold standard established.

Let us now briefly review the record made by the Democratic party, through its representatives in Congress to restore the true Democratic bimetallic system. This record, concisely stated, shows that in the Forty-fourth Congress, the first one with a Democratic majority in the House, 110 Democrats voted for the free and unlimited coinage of silver and 16 against it; and again 123 Democrats voted for and passed a free-coinage bill and only 17 against it.

In the Forty-fifth Congress Bland's free-coinage bill was passed; 97 Democrats, including Hon. John G. Carlisle, voting yea, to only 10 voting nay. In the Republican Senate the free-coinage clause was stricken out and a substitute agreed to for purchasing not less than two nor more than four million dollars of silver per month, and as so amended was passed and vetoed by a Republican President, and then passed by Congress over his veto by 118 Democrats, including Mr. Carlisle, for to 22 Democrats against it in the House, and by 25 Democrats for to 9 against it in the Senate, and became the law of February 28, 1878. In the same Congress the concurrent resolution presented by Senator Matthews, afterwards a justice of the Supreme Court, was passed in the Senate by 23 Democrats for to 7 against it, and in the House by 116 Democrats, including Mr. Carlisle, for to 23 against it.

In the Forty-sixth Congress, in the House, 100 Democrats, including Mr. Carlisle, voted for free and unlimited coinage to only 9 against it, and 107 Democrats, including Mr. Carlisle, voted for to only 4 against an amendment directing and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out standard silver coin the same as gold coin in payment of all coin obligations of the Government.

Think of it! A representative of the honest, toiling masses, Mr. Carlisle, voted in the House to compel a Republican Secretary of the Treasury to pay out silver dollars the same as gold.

Mr. BATE. When was that?

Mr. COCKRELL. In the Forty-sixth Congress. In the Forty-ninth Congress 96 Democrats voted for, to 70 Democrats against, free coinage.

In the Fifty-first Congress 101 Democrats in the House voted for, to only 12 Democrats against, Bland's motion to recommit the Windom silver-purchasing bill with instructions to report a bill for free and unlimited coinage of the silver dollar, and in the Senate Plumb's free and unlimited coinage substitute was passed by 27 Democrats, including Mr. Carlisle, for, to 3 Democrats against it, and in House 113 Democrats voted for this free-coinage substitute to 22 against it. Every Democrat in House and Senate voted against the conference committee report, which became the Sherman law of July 14, 1890.

In the Senate in January, 1891, 24 Democrats voted for free coinage to 1 against it.

In the Fifty-second Congress in the Senate 20 Democrats voted for, to 9 Democrats against, free coinage, and in the House, to consider the Senate free-coinage bill, 118 Democrats voted yea and 64 nay.

In the Fifty-third Congress in the House 101 Democrats voted for, to 116 Democrats against, a free-coinage amendment to the bill for the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law, and in the Senate 18 Democrats voted for, to 18 Democrats against, a free-coinage amendment.

In the House, in March, 1894, Bland's bill, requiring the immediate coinage into standard dollars of the profit or seigniorage in the bullion purchased under the Sherman law of July 14, 1890, amounting to $55,156,680, and then the coinage of the remainder of such bullion into such dollars, to be used in redeeming and canceling the Treasury notes of July 14, 1890, issued in the purchase of the bullion then outstanding to the amount of $152,951,280, was passed by 136 Democratic yeas to 50 Democratic nays, and in the Senate by 30 Democratic yeas to 10 Democratic nays. This was in the Fifty-third Congress—the last Congress.

The bill was vetoed by the President, and in the House 118 Democrats voted for, to 55 Democrats against, passing the bill over the veto, and the veto prevailed, although over two-thirds of the Democrats voting in the House voted to pass it over the veto and three-fourths of the Democrats in the Senate voted yea in passing the bill.

In the Fifty-fourth Congress, the present Congress, in the Senate 22 Democrats, 14 Republicans, and 6 Populists voted yea for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. The nays were only 13 Democrats and 22 Republicans. In the House of Representatives 56 Democrats voted for that bill to 31 Democrats against it. This is their record in Congress.

Mr. President, suppose when the President sent to this body in the Fifty-third Congress his message for the unconditional repeal of the Sherman silver-bullion-purchasing law he had incorporated in that message his message of January 28, 1895, proposing the financial scheme which I have just discussed, and had told Congress that he would even veto a bill for the coinage of the silver bullion in the Treasury, how many votes would he have gotten for the unconditional repeal of that law?

I was speaking of the record of the Democratic party. I have given the record of the Democratic party in Congress. It shows consistent action on every occasion in favor of true bimetallism by the restoration of the silver dollar save alone in the Fifty-third Congress, when unconditional repeal was pressed by the power of the Executive. Then it was that there failed to be a majority of Democratic votes for free and unlimited coinage. Bimetallism has been the policy of the Democratic party in all the legislation and attempted legislation since 1873.

Now, let us look at the record of the Democratic party in its national conventions since 1873. In our platform of 1880 we declared for "honest money"; not the kind of "sound money" or "honest money" that we hear so much about now, but "honest money"—

Consisting of gold and silver, and paper convertible into coin on demand.

In our platform of 1884 we declared:

We believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss.

Not convertible into such gold, but "convertible into such gold or silver money without loss."

In our platform of 1888 we declared:

The Democratic party of the United States, in national convention assembled, renews the pledge of its fidelity to Democratic faith, and reaffirms the platform adopted by its representatives at the convention of 1884.

Thus reaffirming that we believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution.

In our platform of 1892 we declared:

We hold to the use of both gold and silver as—

What?—

as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of—both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage; but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, or be adjusted through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts; and we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coin.

What?—

Not in such gold, but in such gold and silver coin.

The language of our platforms of 1880, 1884, and 1888 is plain and not susceptible of misconstruction. They declared unequivocally for true bimetallism, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, not of one or of the other, but of both. A difference of interpretation of the platform of 1892 has occurred. There is a contention that it means one thing and a contention that it means another. The gold-standard men undertake to make it mean the gold standard; the zealous free-silver advocates claim that it means the free and unlimited coinage of silver. That that platform declares for bimetallism no gold or silver Democrat can deny. That is what it declares for—bimetallism—that is, that we shall use both gold and silver as standard money, money of final payment and redemption, and that we are committed "to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage"—the unlimited, the free coinage of each metal at the ratio fixed by Congress, in full legal-tender money. If it means anything, it means that. There are limitations upon it, some say.

But the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, or be adjusted through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals.

That declaration of the platform was taken from the Republican law of July 14, 1890. That means bimetallism. It is not a contradiction of the record of the Democratic party from the foundation of this Government. It was construed, it is true, by some few of those who were back of the screen and knew what was going on, to mean the gold standard; but they did not want it discussed. They wanted the tariff discussed. That was forced to the front and the financial question was relegated to the rear. But when the election was over and victory was achieved, then the financial question was pressed to the front, and the tariff question relegated to the rear.

Mr. President, I will give you my reasons why I oppose the gold standard. It is anti-Democratic; it is contrary to the entire Democratic record of this Government up to 1873; it is contrary to the traditions of the Democratic party; it is contrary to the legislation attempted to be secured by the Democratic representatives in Congress; it is contrary to the platforms of the party, and it is contrary to the platforms of the party upon which it has achieved its victories.

But there is another objection to the gold standard. There is not gold enough in the world and now being produced to supply the demand for its use as money, the world's money of final payment and redemption, and for industrial purposes. Of all the gold produced in the world it is estimated that at least 50 per cent, or one-half, is used for industrial purposes. Some writers and statisticians of the highest character and standing believe to-day that not only one-half but even more than three-fourths of the entire gold output is annually consumed for industrial purposes, and some even venture to say that it can not be demonstrated that the entire product is not consumed for industrial purposes. But admitting that only one-half of it is used for industrial purposes, then only one-half is left for monetary purposes. By the mint report—the report of a gold monometallist of the extremist type—the world's product of gold in four hundred years, from 1493 to 1893, only amounted to $8,399,101,000—only $6.65 per capita of the world's population to-day. But one-half of that was used industrially, and that left only $3,965,900,000 as money in 1893, being only $3.14 per capita. Will any sane, intelligent man tell me that $3.14 per capita is a sufficiency of money of final payment and redemption for many billion dollars of indebtedness and for the exchange of the billions of dollars of the annual products of the world?

But now let us look at the current production. In the five years from 1889 to 1893 the average annual product of gold was only a little over $135,000,000. If it had all been used as money, there would only have been 10 cents and 7 mills per capita; but only one-half of it was used as money, and that left only 5 cents and three-tenths of a cent for use as money, which was wholly insufficient to meet the demands of the increasing population and commerce and to restore the annual losses by abrasion and otherwise.

Gold can not be produced at the will of man. More wars have been waged and more bloodshed caused by the thirst and avarice of the seekers for gold than by all other causes combined, and yet it has never been and can never be secured in unlimited quantities. It can not be produced in any given quantity; it is uncertain in its production; it is not now money; it does not circulate in any country in the world as money; it is hoarded; it is a reserve, and only recently it was largely at a premium, and the money brokers of the world have it completely cornered.

I oppose it, further, because it is a theory of two moneys, discord between the two precious metals, which have gone hand in hand with each other from the earliest ages down to this time. It is gold for the rich, monarchical, aristocratic element, and silver for the masses. It is not our policy. No nation can use gold only. We must use silver. No nation on earth can use gold as its only coin money. You can not make dollars and half dollars and quarters and dimes out of it. It has been tried, and it has proved a failure. You must use silver. Let gold and silver be used upon terms of equality with no discrimination.

Another objection to gold is that it fluctuates. It is unstable in its product and in its purchasing power; it is timid and cowardly. The least change in its value causes it to go from nation to nation. Ever since 1873 the most gigantic struggle the world has ever beheld has been waged for the acquisition of gold. What is the evidence of that? I could read author after author, but I will take the gold records of the mints of the world.

The world's product of gold in 20 years, from 1873 to 1893, was $2,368,000,000. One-half of it at least was used industrially. That left one-half for money, or $1,184,000,000. In the same period, when we only had $1,184,000,000 of gold for coinage, we coined $3,020,200,000 of gold, being $1,836,000,000 more gold coined than was left for coinage of the entire world's product, and being $652,000,000 more gold than the world produced in that entire period. This astounding excess of the coinage of gold over the product was caused by its shifting from nation to nation and being recoined. That shows the terrible struggle, the fearful struggle for gold. In times of danger and war where does gold go? It flees to its hiding places and its safe retreats, and it remains hidden, secreted, until white-winged peace prevails over the land. Then the gold comes forth, and, under the name of patriotism and loyalty, it buys all the debts which have been contracted during the war at from 50 cents to 60 cents on the dollar, and then demands repayment in gold. Witness the Venezuelan message here, with a string tied to it, indicating the possibility of war. What was the result on your precious gold standard? The whole fabric trembled like jelly from ocean to ocean and from nation to nation, and in one day the New York papers say the shrinkage in the value of the securities upon the market was from three hundred and fifty to five hundred million dollars. Yet you want this uncertain, timid standard continued.

These are not predictions; the arguments I make are not fears; they are incontrovertible facts and figures. They prove what? They prove conclusively that the gold standard is a miserable, costly, disastrous failure; a failure to-day; it is stamped a failure upon every lineament and every part of it. It is the enrichment of the rich and the impoverishment of the masses. It is the increased purchasing power of the dollars named in the bonds and credits and the decreased selling price of all the products of the world.

Mr. President, that it is the British gold standard is another objection to it. It has been tried by the greatest commercial nation, the greatest creditor nation, and has proven a failure in England, for twice has the great Bank of England, with its unequaled facilities for securing and hoarding gold at almost a moment's warning, borrowed gold of bimetallic France. First, in the crisis of 1837 and 1839 the Bank of England borrowed 50,000,000 francs, or $10,000,000, from bimetallic France; second, in 1890, in the Baring Bros. failure, when the Bank of England and the whole gold-standard fabric in every nation, kindred, and tongue was trembling and ready to totter and fall, the Bank of England borrowed $15,000,000 of gold from bimetallic France. If England has not been able to stem the tide of adversity, how can we? England is the greatest money power. It is the great power of money and the money lender which demands the gold standard to-day—a most dangerous, selfish, and avaricious power.

Please hear what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said in this Chamber on February 20, last:

> But, Mr. President, Lord Salisbury obeys a stronger force, a mightier will than his own. In the last resort, the power which controls in Europe and in England is the great power of money and of the money lender. The money lenders do not care how many Armenians are butchered; the Armenians are not nominated in the bond; but they care very much that nothing shall be done to disturb or jar anything; that nothing shall be done to disturb values; and they fear that if England moved to rescue the wretched Armenians values might be disturbed and Ottoman bonds decline.

It is this money power of Europe and the money lender who want the gold standard. Why are they attempting to force it upon this country to-day? Why do the Rothschilds and the Belmonts and the Morgans want it? Is it for the interest of the toiling masses? Is it to better the condition of the masses? Is it patriotism? Is it philanthropy? Is it humanity? Let the people think. Are those men acting from these motives, or is it for the purpose of increasing the purchasing power of every dollar named in their securities and decreasing the present selling price of every dollar's worth of products of the sweat and toil and labor of the millions of the world? That is it pure and simple, nothing more, nothing less, and nothing else. Why should the bankers, the brokers, the money lenders, and the gold jobbers be allowed to dictate the financial system of the United States? Do they want it in the interest of the people? Is it not for their own interests? They would not be human beings if it were not. They are not angels, and they make no profession of being such. They are like other men. They want to increase their own gains. They hold to the doctrine that he that provideth not for his own household "hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel."

Why should they force upon us the single gold standard? If they do, if the bankers and the brokers and the money lenders and the bondholders force upon this country the single gold standard, then the manufacturers ought to force upon this country the tariff laws; then the whisky producers should be allowed to dictate to this country the laws which shall govern the distillation of spirits; the railroads should be allowed to come here and tell us what laws they want. They are just as patriotic and humanitarian and philanthropic as are these money brokers and money lenders.

Mr. MORGAN. They are more so.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are more so, the Senator from Alabama very truthfully and appropriately says. No, Mr. President, the very men who desire and are attempting to-day to force this single gold British standard upon this country should be a warning to the masses of the people never to submit to it.

I think I have shown conclusively by facts and figures and legitimate argument, not by denunciation, that the gold standard is a miserable, costly failure. What do we propose? We propose a constitutional Democratic bimetallic system, open the mints of the United States to the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver upon equal terms into money of equal debt-paying and purchasing power, standard money, money of final payment and redemption.

What are the objections to it? Our gold monometallist friends—we have heard a great deal about that very recently—say, "Oh, do not agitate the silver question, it will divide the Democratic party." No, no, Mr. President, the advocacy of a cardinal, monumental principle of the Democratic faith, clearly outlined and sustained by our written Constitution, maintained and revered by our party from its foundation until silver was destroyed by the Republican party in 1873, and the restoration of which has ever since then been demanded by our party representatives in Congress and proclaimed in our national platforms in 1880, 1884, 1888, and 1892, surely can not now divide or disrupt the Democratic party. On the contrary, such advocacy will maintain our fidelity to Democratic faith and will aid in strengthening and preserving the Democratic party. It is the policy upon which we have won all our victories. Not one has ever been won on the gold standard, and not one will ever be. We have been told by the so-called sound-money men that in Missouri we have had an object lesson, that in the elections of 1894 the Republican party elected a majority of the Representatives in Congress, and that it was because we had a free-silver platform. Is that so? Is that a legitimate argument? What did we have in the Fifty-third Congress as the result of the election in 1892, and what in the States of New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Delaware? Let us see what we had. I will make the comparison.

In New York, in 1892, we elected 20 Democratic Representatives in Congress; in 1894 we elected 6. In Ohio, in 1892, we elected 11; in 1894, 2. In Pennsylvania, in 1892, we elected 9; in 1894, 2. In New Jersey, in 1892, we elected 6; in 1894, none. In Connecticut, in 1892, we elected 3; in 1894, none. In Massachusetts, in 1892, we elected 4; in 1894, 1. In Rhode Island, in 1892, we elected 2, and in 1894, none. In Delaware, in 1892, we elected 1, and in 1894, none.

Here was the Democratic party in the States which I have named fighting under the gold-standard banner of the Administration. It was not understood by the masses of the voters in 1892 to be a gold-standard banner, but in 1894 it was demonstrated that it was a single, gold standard banner. What was the result? Look at it. There it is. In 1895, only at the last election last fall, the executive administration and gold-standard policy were indorsed in unequivocal terms in Democratic platforms in Ohio, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

Were victories the result? No. There is no danger of dividing the Democratic party. Those who do not believe in the cardinal, monumental principle of that party, the true bimetallic standard, the beacon light, the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night, which has guided the Democratic hosts for a century, during all its constitutional existence, as their true financial policy, and given it its undying vitality, will slough off from the party; but it will not divide the Democratic party. There is no danger of division.

But, Mr. President, they say that if you give free and unlimited coinage to the standard silver dollar you will drive all the gold out of the country and contract the currency by $600,000,000 before you can coin any silver, and then what a catastrophe that will be. That has been the old prophecy we have heard ever since 1878. I have heard it semiannually, annually, and quadrennially ever since. Let us look at the record and see what it has done.

In 1878 we did not have a silver dollar. Now we have 423,000,000 of standard silver dollars. In 1878 we were estimated to have $25,000,000 of gold, all on the Pacific Coast. We commenced the coinage of silver in February, 1878. In January, 1879, we had $234,000,000 of gold, an increase of over $200,000,000 the first year of silver coinage. In 1882 we had over $525,000,000 of gold; in 1885, over $578,000,000; in 1888, over $706,000,000; in 1891, over $707,000,000; in 1894, over $670,000,000; in 1895, over $618,000,000. Here the record proves the falsity of this prediction for the last twenty years. It is only the nightmare of gold monomaniaism pure and simple, and nothing else.

But suppose the prediction were true. Let us just suppose that the restoration of bimetallism drove all the gold out of the country. Where would it go? Think of it. It belongs to somebody; it can not pick itself up and walk off by itself and hide itself. What would they do with it? Where would they take it? They would take it to Europe. What would they do with it? They would put it in the bank vaults there as a reserve, and it would multiply and increase the value of the reserve there. If there was any possibility of there being anything like half enough gold in the world to meet the purposes of the world for money, it would produce such an excess of gold in Europe that it would depreciate the price; it would necessarily produce an excess of it in those particular places. But they will not give it away when they get it over there. No man will say that. If they do not put it into banks and hoard it, they will sell it for something they are more anxious to hold than gold, something that will be of value, and they will bring it to this country and we shall not have lost one dollar's worth of value.

What will be the effect of gold going out of the country? There will be no full-standard money then but the silver dollar. What will the banks do for a reserve? They are bound to keep a reserve. They will take the silver. Somebody is bound to take it. Silver will then be the only money of final payment, the only money in which national-bank paper can be redeemed or other obligations paid, and that will create a demand for silver; that will increase its price. The flow of gold to Europe will decrease the price of gold there, and that will inevitably bring the two metals to an approximate value. It is inevitable; we can not avoid it.

But we are told that it will derange our foreign trade. No, Mr. President, no. During the entire war period we had no gold, we had no silver, we had no coin, and yet we had no trouble with our exchanges—none in the world. What we sell in foreign countries is paid for in the money of the country to which we sell, and what they sell here is paid for in our money. This will be so, no matter what our standard may be.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator in that connection state what was the rate of foreign exchange during the last year and a half of the war?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know; but I suppose gold was very high.

Mr. HOAR. It was about 260 or 270.

Mr. COCKRELL. Possibly it was. At one time gold was 270 or 280; but still we got along very pleasantly without it.

That is a mere prediction; but there is another prediction, and that prediction is that it will drive home all our foreign securities; that this country will be deluged with our securities held abroad.

Again, we are told that the restoration of silver would stop the investments of foreign money in this country and cause all our American securities, bonds, etc., held abroad to be returned to this country, and really seem seriously alarmed. What greater blessing could be bestowed upon this country than the giving to our nation and people a sufficient amount of sound, irredeemable gold and silver coined money of our Constitution to enable our people to transact all their business, develop all our resources, and pay for and own all the obligations and debts of every kind of our Government, States, municipalities, and corporations, and receive the interest and enjoy perfect financial independence of all nations and all gold syndicates? Suppose the bonds and securities are returned here; the holders will certainly not give them to us. All they can do is to bring them and sell them to us at such prices as we are willing to pay. Shall we forever remain dependent for money upon the Rothschilds and associates? How can our people earn and secure our own money unless our Government by law authorizes its coinage.

Yet they tell us, and this is the argument upon which they rely, that the opening of our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver equally with gold would deluge us with the silver of the world. I am willing to rest the cause of the free coinage of silver upon this one issue. The charge that we will be deluged with silver is a prediction, a fear, an apprehension, a dread. Where is the silver of the world? It is, first, in manufactures, in ornaments; second, in bullion; third, in money, and, fourth, in the bowels of the earth. You can not find any silver in this world anywhere else. There it all is, every bit of it.

How will that silver get here? Take the silver that is in ornaments, in manufactures, in arts. Does not everyone know that that silver is more valuable in the art, in the ornament, in the manufacture in which it exists than it would be if you were to pay for its extraction and then have it coined, destroying the whole ornament, the art, the manufacture of which it is a part? Common sense tells us all that no silver will come from that source. Is there any silver bullion in the world? Search the world over, and I challenge any man to show $20,000,000 of silver bullion anywhere on this earth. It is not stowed away like pig lead, and pig iron, and copper, and zinc, and other metals that can be produced in unlimited quantities. But I will treat of that more fully hereafter.

The next question is as to that which is in money. Will that come here? Let us go by the record. I make no predictions. I want to test the question of the deluge of silver by the recorded facts of history, facts that everyone can see for himself. By our mint report of 1894 the silver money in the world was $3,435,000,000 full legal tender and $619,000,000 of limited legal tender, aggregating more than $4,000,000,000. Let us analyze it. Will this limited legal-tender silver money come here if we open our mints to the unlimited coinage of silver? It contains from 5 to 10 cents less silver to the dollar than our dollar. If it came here there would be an actual loss, aside from the expense of remitting, of from 5 to 10 cents on every dollar's worth. How is it used in the countries where it exists? It is limited legal tender—that is, it is a legal tender for from five to ten dollars—and as such limited legal tender it is the equal of gold. It is the money of the people. It is in daily use. It is the money with which 90 per cent of the individual transactions of the masses of the people is conducted. Go to London, go to any of the cities of the world, and go to the markets and see the kind of money that does the millions of dollars of business of individual transactions. Go to England, with her $105,000,000 of limited legal-tender silver coin. It is the equal of gold for $10. It pays a debt of less than $10 equally with gold. Is any Englishman going to gather up that silver and bring it here and lose from 5 to 10 cents on the dollar in order to get an American silver dollar?

Now, think of it. I want honest, intelligent, thoughtful men to think of this proposition. Will the Englishmen do it? You know they will not. No sane man would do it. If such a man should land here an inquisition of lunacy would be held over him immediately, and he would be sent to an asylum. No, no; it can not come.

Now, let us go to the full legal-tender money. That is the largest amount. Where is it to-day? One-half of all the silver money in the world is in India and China. How is it in India? It is in the silver rupee coined at the ratio of 15 to 1, 6.2 cents less in the dollar than we have. There gold is not a legal tender. Silver is the only legal-tender money in the country. It is the only money they have. It constitutes only $3.20 per capita. Will they bring their full legal-tender silver money here and suffer a loss of 6.2 cents on the dollar in order to get American silver dollars which they can not take out of this country, because the moment they leave our territory the silver becomes bullion? No, no. Will China? All the silver there is only $2.08 per capita. It is in the hands of the people. They have no gold coinage. Silver is the only money they are beginning to coin. It is there the money of the people, in the hands of the millions and the hundreds of millions of people there. They can not do without it. It is carried from one end of the country to the other. It can not come here.

Now, how about the balance of the silver, the other half of it, full legal tender, remember, coined in every nation at the ratio of 15½ to 1, 3 cents less silver in the dollar than in our dollar? In every country it is the equal of gold. It is full legal-tender money. It is standard money. It is the equal of gold in those countries in the purchase of property and in the payment of debts, and to come here to our mints there must be an actual loss of 3 cents on every dollar, besides the expense of transportation and the delays incident to its recoinage. Why will the silver thalers of Germany, the equal of gold in all transactions, be brought here to the United States to suffer a loss of 3 cents on the dollar? Now, think of it, intelligent men. When you talk about the deluge and shake yourselves with fear and apprehension that this country will be lined over with silver, think of it; think of how it will get here; whence it will come. Will that of France come here? Certainly not. No one pretends that it will. There it is the equal of gold. There it is used equally with gold and at a less ratio than ours, as I said, at 15½ to 1. There is no danger of the silver in ornaments or the silver in bullion or the silver in money coming to this country and flooding us; not a particle.

But we are told that there is an overproduction of silver and that it will deluge us with the metal; that we can not afford to resort to free coinage because of this overproduction. We have heard this in season and out of season. Let us analyze the question of overproduction. This is a prediction, as every argument against silver is. It is said that we have an overproduction. An overproduction how? Compared with the record of the past. That is the only way we can have an overproduction. Let us see if that is the fact. Now we can deal with you, my good monometallist friends, on questions of fact in records which are accessible to us all. But before I leave the question which I was just discussing, I wish to make one more point. I want to know what the people of the world would do with the silver if it were here.

You talk about this country being deluged with silver. Suppose all the silver in the world were dumped into our mints and coined into standard silver dollars in one day; how much would we have? With all the silver money in the world we would have just $46.69 per capita, a very little more money than France has to-day. That would be all. Does anybody believe that all the silver money in the world can be gathered up and brought to our mints in a year, in five years, in ten years, in twenty years, or till Gabriel blows his trumpet? Just think of it. I want to know of those who fear the flood of silver, who is to go through all the nations of the earth with their diverse languages and money coins, some with less and others more silver in them, some new and many worn and abraded, find them, buy them, carrying along the gold or something sufficiently valuable to pay for them, pay the cost of transporting to our mints and have them coined into our dollars?

Just think of the proposition. The mere suggestion shows the ridiculous absurdity of such a prophecy as the flooding of this country with the silver of the world. But what would they do with it? Now they have brought it all here, what are they going to do with it? Would they give it to us? Oh, no. What would they do? They would take it to our mints; certainly. They would have it coined; certainly. They would get it back; certainly. And that would be the end of it. That is all we propose. Open the mints to the silver of the world; let it come along and be coined into our dollars. Take them and do what you please with them. What are they to do with them then, pray tell me? They would not give them to us? Oh, no. They would not take them away from this country? Oh, no. The moment they got them out of our territorial limits they would be bullion. They would have to buy something that we were willing to sell them at our price. That is all. Would that be a curse to this country, with our billions of products to be sold, if they were sold for standard money, constitutional money, the equal of gold by our laws? Certainly that is all they could do with it.

Now I come to overproduction. In the fifty years from 1801 to 1850 of the total product of the gold and silver of the world, for every $100 worth, 36.7 per cent was gold and 63.3 per cent was silver. Now take the twenty years from 1874 to 1893, when there was an overproduction charged. What was the product? Of every $100 worth of both gold and silver, 47.4 per cent was gold and only 52.6 per cent was silver, $10 less silver in every $100 worth of both metals in the twenty years from 1874 to 1893 than in the fifty years from 1801 to 1850, and you call it overproduction. For the ten years from 1831 to 1840 the product of silver was 64.77 per cent in every $100 worth of both, and in the ten years from 1881 to 1890 it was only 55.07 per cent of silver, $9.70 less silver in every $100 worth in the ten years from 1881 to 1890 than in the ten years from 1831 to 1840. Does that show an overproduction? Certainly not.

From 1493 to 1873 the record shows the production of silver to gold to have been 20 to 50 per cent greater than it has been since 1873. There is the record in the mint reports. Those reports state it just as I say. It shows that during that period the production of silver to gold was 20 to 50 per cent greater at different dates than it has been at any time since 1873, and yet what a remarkably steady ratio was maintained between the two metals for that entire period of four hundred years. No, Mr. President, no deluge of silver will ever come to this country from other countries. There never has been a deluge.

There is another fact that can not be answered. No nation on this earth has ever been deluged with more silver full legal-tender money than it could use, or of silver and gold combined. Silver can not be produced in unlimited quantities any more than gold. But here is another argument, and I challenge any gold-standard advocate to refute it or to meet it. I say it is an unanswerable argument. I state that in advance, that your attention may be specifically directed to it. By the mint records of 1894, in the twenty-one years from 1873 to 1893 the world's silver production was $2,609,925,533. Twenty per cent of that at least was used for industrial purposes. Many estimate it higher. Deduct 20 per cent for industrial purposes, and you have left for monetary use $2,087,940,427. How much silver was coined in the mints of the world during that time? In that period of twenty-one years the world coined $2,457,993,104 of silver, being $370,052,677 more of silver than was left for monetary purposes. Deduct only 12½ per cent, and everybody must admit that more than that was used for industrial purposes, and yet the world coined $174,308,262 more of silver than was left for monetary purposes.

Now, my friends, these are not idle predictions. They are the recorded facts and figures of history, and they conclusively prove, first, that there is no silver bullion in the world stored away; secondly, that the annual production of silver is wholly consumed year by year and more too; and, third, that as in the past so it will be in the future, the annual product of silver will be consumed in the world. It must be so. Why? No nation can do with gold only. No nation can ever get along with gold as its only metallic money. You can not make your dollars and half dollars out of it. You have to use silver, and every gold nation on earth to-day is using silver as a limited legal tender and as small money. That silver must be annually added to. It rapidly disappears. It is abraded and worn. It is lost. It has to be supplied annually, and some nations have a fixed law prescribing an annual increase of silver coin in proportion to the population, and the annual increased consumption is equal to the annual product. Then the gold nations can not do without silver, because silver is the money of the world to-day, in which 90 per cent of the individual transactions are had. England can not part with her silver; Germany can not; France can not. None of the nations of the world can, and they must add to their coinage every year.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator's statement is exceedingly interesting to me, the most interesting statement of the proposition to which I have had the honor to listen, and I have listened to many on this same general subject. What does the Senator from Missouri understand to be the motive of all those European nations, then, in limiting the coinage of silver?

Mr. COCKRELL. Simply because their Governments are in the hands of the aristocratic, the wealthy classes, and they want to increase the purchasing power of the dollars named in their bonds and securities and to depress the selling price of all the products of the world that they have to buy.

Mr. HOAR. But my question is not exactly answered. If, as the Senator understands, opening the mints to the free coinage of silver will not decrease the purchasing power of gold at all, but it will remain the same——

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not say it will not decrease the purchasing power of gold. I say it will. I did not say it will not.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator claimed that the standard money of the country would remain of equal value——

Mr. COCKRELL. It would.

Mr. HOAR. If we opened the mints to the coinage of silver?

Mr. COCKRELL. It would, by silver going up and gold coming down.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then those moneyed men and aristocrats have not increased the purchasing power of the dollar of the country or have not affected it by closing their mints——

Mr. COCKRELL. They would, if they were to open their mints to the coinage of silver. They did affect it by stopping the coinage of silver. They doubled the purchasing power of every dollar of their securities by demonetizing silver, and they want to hold to it. If you will read Mr. Rothschild's statement before the Berlin conference, at which the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was present, you will see he says: "The low prices of wheat and other products is not a curse; it is not injurious to us." Certainly not. I will in a moment come to that point to show why England wants gold monometallism. In an article from The Statist——

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps, if I do not understand—I am sure that I do—the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; it is no interruption.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator to claim that the quantity of silver used in different countries as money would not be changed, that none of the silver of other countries would come here any more than there is now, by opening our mints to the free coinage of silver; that they would keep their silver as they have it now and we would keep ours as we have it now; that there would be no change. I do not see, if that doctrine be true, what difference the limiting of the coinage of silver by the great European nations has made to anybody. That is my trouble.

Mr. COCKRELL. The limiting of it is in the fact that they have got it as a minor coin, a legal tender for not exceeding $10, and the Rothschilds are never bothered with silver. They do not have ten-dollar transactions, as Mr. Alfred de Rothschild said in the Berlin conference. He said: "Why, we can not have full legal-tender silver. My house transacts business amounting to several million dollars at a time, and we could not have silver dollars." Oh, no, that kind of money must not be made for that race and that class of bankers.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps that is very good sarcasm on Baron Rothschild, if he be a baron, but it does not quite answer my inquiry. I understand the Senator to say that if we opened our mints to the free coinage of silver there would be no temptation whatever to bring the silver from any part of the earth here; that it would remain as now performing its functions. To be sure there is a limited coinage there, but it would remain just where it is now. The limited coinage of silver in all those countries is the equal of gold at a ratio, as the Senator has just stated. I can not understand, if that proposition be true, how it is that the limitation of the coinage of silver in those countries or in this country makes any difference to any mortal man.

Mr. COCKRELL. It makes all the difference in the world, as I have said.

Mr. HOAR. The silver in this country now, under our limited coinage of silver, our five or six hundred millions, is equal to gold.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. HOAR. It is quite as good.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly. It is true that in the panic several years ago silver was 3 per cent above gold in value.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly it was, and Secretary Carlisle refused to receive gold for it at that time.

Mr. HOAR. I understand. I am not talking about the bullion values; I am talking about the money values.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is it exactly.

Mr. HOAR. The silver in this country which we have coined is equal in money value to gold to-day. It is equal in the other countries in money value to gold, where it is coined, the limited amount, and the silver of the world exists, that in money and that in the arts, with that value. Now, I am not asking about whether the fact be so or not, but I take the Senator's statement. He says for us to open our mints to silver would not change that.

Mr. COCKRELL. It would not cause that silver to come to our mints.

Mr. HOAR. It would not cause it to come to this country. Therefore it would leave the silver of the world exactly where it is—unaffected. If that be so, what earthly difference does it make whether the existing condition shall continue or not?

Mr. COCKRELL. There are two things. Silver is a limited legal tender there, and in that capacity it is not a measure of value.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, the coined silver is a full legal tender there as it is here.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I beg pardon. There are two kinds of coined silver.

Mr. HOAR. It is of full legal value.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is the limited legal tender, $619,909,000. That is limited in legal tender, anywhere from $2 up to $10—40 shillings in England. That does not pay any of the debts and obligations. Silver is not the standard and measure of value. The standard and measure of value in England is gold. In Germany it is the gold standard. In other nations it has been the gold standard. The amount of gold is the measure of value of the products of the world, and silver is not estimated in it. Therefore gold has doubled in its increased purchasing power and silver does not affect prices. Gold does affect prices, and its scarcity decreases prices.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the silver in this country would perform exactly the same function if it was paper that it does now?

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Precisely. It is not treated as money of final payment at all.

Mr. TELLER. It would not measure value.

Mr. HOAR. That is transferring the question to another thing. My question was to test the soundness or correctness of the Senator's argument, which has been so very interesting and so very powerful and clear. I will state my proposition. It does not make any difference whether the gold is the standard or not with reference to this proposition. The Senator says there is in Germany and in France and in England a certain amount of silver. Being a limited amount, whether in terms it is a legal tender in small sums or large—in fact, the coined silver of those countries is equal in its existing value, not bullion value, but the value after it is coined, to gold.

Mr. GRAY. In exchangeable value.

Mr. HOAR. In exchangeable value. You can at any time take silver dollars or their equivalent in this country, in England, or elsewhere, and exchange them for corresponding gold coin on equal terms. So far that is agreed. The Senator says if you were to open the mints of this country to the unlimited coinage of silver, instead of limiting it to the limited amount of circulation here, there would not any more silver come to this country than there is now; that the same amount of silver would remain over there, because there is no temptation to bring it here. Then the silver of the world would be in exactly the same condition.

Mr. TELLER. No; not in the same condition.

Mr. HOAR. Abroad they would have it in the same condition. The silver of the world would maintain in those countries precisely the same relation to gold that it has now, and the silver here would have the same relation to gold that it has now.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. HOAR. Now, what earthly advantage is there in those countries to the gold men, to these Rothschild demons, in maintaining their limited coinage, if taking away the limit does not change the relation between coined silver and coined gold and does not make a flow of the silver of the world to one country, to the country where the coinage is unlimited from the countries where it is limited? What earthly difference does it make? That is my proposition.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I have explained fully that the silver money of the world where it is will remain there and will not come if we restore the free and unlimited coinage. It is limited in its power there. There are $679,909,000 of limited legal-tender silver. It is coined at the ratio of about 14½ to 1. There is much less silver in it, from 5 to 10 cents less silver, and it will not come here. The amount of the silver as full legal tender there is limited. There is no free coinage. It is limited in amount. It is the full equal of gold there; they are using it as such; they will not part with it; they must have it in the character in which it is used now, and they must add to it.

Mr. HOAR. Should we have any more silver coined here than we have now?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we should have more coined here.

Mr. HOAR. Where would it come from?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think perhaps not so much would go into the arts and manufactures and there would probably be a stimulated production of silver in our own country. The silver product has fallen off in the past few years; but it would not come in an amount sufficient to flood the country or be more than we could consume as we have done in the last twenty years.

Mr. HOAR. As I understood the Senator a little while ago, he said that he did not think the amount of silver in the arts would be diminished?

Mr. COCKRELL. I said that that which is already used in the arts would not come to us.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator suppose that some would come from other countries to be used in the arts?

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose that there would but little come.

Mr. HOAR. Practically——

Mr. COCKRELL. Practically it would go back to just what it was before.

Mr. HOAR. It would make no substantial difference.

Mr. COCKRELL. But just for the time being. I say the mere fact of our opening our mints might for a short time bring some silver to us that would not otherwise come, but there would be no flood, no deluge, no danger from it; no more would come than we could assimilate and absorb as money of final payment and redemption and the equal of gold.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator understand that the stimulus to increased mining of silver would have an effect which would reduce the value of silver?

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator understand that by having the unlimited coinage of silver in this country there would be an increased silver product occasioned by the stimulus for the mining of silver which would have an effect on the proportionate value in its relation to gold?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I do not think it would have any effect on the value. There would be a little increased product, but not an unlimited one, because it never has been and never could be produced in unlimited quantities.

Mr. HOAR. Then my original question is, what earthly difference does it make whether we maintain or do not maintain free coinage?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me a moment, I should like to state to the Senator from Massachusetts the contention of the bimetallists. It is that the standard money, which is gold now everywhere (for silver in this country, whatever may be its relation to gold, is a subordinate money), determines the prices of products the world over. I saw that recently disputed in the New York Tribune, and I went to-day to look up what old Blackstone said on the subject, and he lays that down as early as his time as an unquestioned law of money. We say if that is true, when you open the mints to silver and make silver and gold equal in their money functions and money privileges you have done exactly what you would have done if you had transmuted by some process all of that silver into gold. As I have heard the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] say, it is the potentiality of all the silver bullion in the world to perform the functions of gold. That is what makes it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, I come to another prediction, or rather a statement of fact. It is remarkable. I want to call the attention of the lawyers of the Senate to it. The objection is that law can not increase the value of the metal in the coin.

Mr. PALMER. I apprehend nobody disputes that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought the Senator would assert it.

Mr. PALMER. I suppose that whenever the law furnishes a new employment for a metal it increases its value.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, I did not understand the Senator. I beg pardon; he states the proposition correctly. But I am sorry that while my distinguished friend from Illinois maintains a true cardinal bimetallic principle he is still following after the will-o'-the-wisps and the jack-o'-lanterns of the gold standard.

Mr. PALMER. I have always maintained, and I repeat now for the benefit of my friend from Missouri, that silver may be enhanced in value by giving it new uses, but I doubt whether silver can be made as valuable as gold, for the reason that I need not take time to point out.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, then, our gold monometallist friends sneer at the 50-cent silver dollar; they tell us that the commercial value of the silver is only 50 cents in the dollar, and the distinguished jurist and statesman, Hon. John G. Carlisle, formerly a member of this body, now Secretary of the Treasury, in his gold-standard campaign of last year asserted upon the stump these words:

The laws establishing ratio do not affect the value of the metal contained in the coin, either at home or abroad, because it is the metal—that fixes the value of the coin and not the coin that fixes the value of the metal.

Then, my good friend from Illinois is not a full-fledged gold-standard advocate. Here is the gold-standard assertion, headed by Secretary Carlisle, and the whole procession began proclaiming the same doctrine, and have kept it up ever since. Silver dollars are dishonest money in their estimation. Legislation against silver, they tell us, did not cause a fall in the commercial prices of the silver metal, nor the fall in the prices of the commodities of the world, nor the rise in the purchasing power of gold. These are most remarkable assumptions and assertions.

What is it that gives to gold and silver their value? Why are they precious metals? We can not eat them; we can not live on them for food and clothing. We can only wear them as ornaments. They have only two uses that give them any value. One is their use industrially in the arts and manufactures. This is a limited demand. The other is their use for monetary purposes. If you open the mints of the world to the free coinage of both it creates an unlimited demand. The law for the coinage of gold and silver establishes an unlimited demand at a fixed price, and it fixes commercial value at that price.

Mr. PALMER. Will my friend from Missouri allow me to remind him of the expression he used a few minutes ago? I understood him to say that the parity of values, in very common phrase, would be produced by two processes; that one would be the enhanced value in silver, and the other would be a depression in the price of gold.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Is that his theory?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly. I do not agree with Secretary Carlisle, as I shall show directly. The law for the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at a fixed ratio creates an unlimited demand for the metal at a fixed price. Now, destroy that law and you destroy that unlimited demand for the metal, and that metal falls in its commercial value because that is the only demand left for its use, and the other metal that still has free and unlimited coinage has still an increased and unlimited demand and it rises in its purchasing power. Without law there is no money, no legal tender, no fixed value, no ratio, no payment of any obligation at the end of the law. Without law gold and silver are mere metals, have no fixed value, no fixed price, no fixed ratio; they are only accepted as any other commodity, at whatever price may be agreed upon. Now, by law they are created into money. Money does not exist by nature; money is the creature of law and of law alone.

Mr. President, I have numerous quotations here to sustain the theory that money is the creature of law; that the commercial value of silver was depressed and lowered by its demonetization and the discriminating legislation against it; that with the lowering of the price of silver followed the lowering of the prices of all the products of the world—real, personal, and mixed—and also the increased purchasing power of gold. Gold has doubled in its increased purchasing power, while silver has still the purchasing power it always has had relatively measured by commodities.

I quote from the speech of Hon. John G. Carlisle in the House in 1878, who said:

I know that the world's stock of the precious metals is none too large, and I see no reason to apprehend that it will ever become so. Mankind will be fortunate indeed if the annual production of gold and silver shall keep pace with the annual increase of population, commerce, and industry. According to my view of the subject, the conspiracy which seems to have been formed here and in Europe to destroy by legislation from three-sevenths to one-half the metallic money of the world is the most gigantic crime of this or any other age. The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilence, and famine that ever occurred in the history of the world. The absolute and instantaneous destruction of half the entire movable property of the world, including houses, ships, railroads, and all other appliances for carrying on commerce, while it would be felt more sensibly at the moment, would not produce anything like the prolonged distress and disorganization of society that must inevitably result from the permanent annihilation of one-half the metallic money in the world.

It is the truest prophecy that he ever uttered. It has been exemplified ever since 1873, and to-day we are experiencing the disasters which he predicted would be the result of that policy.

I want to call attention to Hon. John G. Carlisle as a lawyer and the representative of the honest yeomanry of Kentucky when he was declaring what effect law had upon money:

With an ample currency—

Said he in 1878—

With an ample currency, an industrious and frugal people will speedily rebuild their works of internal improvement and repair losses of property, but no amount of industry or economy on the part of the people can create money.

Listen to that!—"can create money"—

When the Government creates or authorizes it the citizen may acquire it, but he can do nothing more.

There is Hon. John G. Carlisle when he upon the floor of the Senate represented the honest yeomanry of Kentucky and before he was wined and dined by the Belmonts and the Rothschilds, the gold brokers and the bond lovers of Europe and Lombard street. I say in 1878 Secretary Carlisle announced the principle correctly. In 1895, when he attempted to reverse himself, he stated what is contrary to the whole history of the world and every legal writer upon the question.

When our Government authorizes by law the coinage of gold and silver into our dollars of money it stamps upon the faces of the coined money the year of the coinage, the words "United States of America" and the value of the coin; if silver, "One dollar," and if gold, "Ten dollars," "Five dollars," and declares the legal-tender value to be the nominal or stamped value.

Mr. President, coined dollars are then money, absolute money, irredeemable money, without price and of the exact value stamped upon their face. There is no such thing as cheap money. Cheap money of final payment and redemption! There is no such thing. Paper currency, although a legal tender, is a redeemable money. It is not absolute money, it is not the measure of value. It is redeemable, and depends upon the solvency of the Government issuing it. The Government may issue it to such an amount that it will become utterly worthless and not even worth the paper on which it is printed.

Mr. GRAY. Its value depends upon the probability of its being redeemed.
